Mr. Heald: I welcome the measures in the Budget which deal with small businesses. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the measure suggested by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown)—slapping an extra 1 per cent. on national insurance contributions for the self-employed—would be a disaster for small businesses and would affect the competitiveness of British industry?

Mr. Clarke: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Skinner: What about what the Government are doing later today?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend was speaking about an increase in the national insurance contribution for the self-employed. The hon. Gentleman is wrong. We are raising it for employees this evening.

If implemented, the proposal made by the right hon. Member for Yeovil would, as my hon. Friend said, damage the interests of self-employed people. Self-employment grew rapidly in the 1980s and, in a modern economy, it is desirable that we reduce the burden on people going for self-employment, rather than increasing it in the way proposed by the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Beith: The Chancellor presumably recognises that the rate of contribution by the self-employed is below that paid by employed people and employers. As the Budget strategy depends very much on low interest rates and low inflation, will the Chancellor look carefully and favourably at the proposal made by the Treasury Select Committee today, which carries the support of all but one member of the Committee, for a central bank that has autonomous responsibility for monetary policy? Is not that the way to lock in low interest rates and low inflation? Will he give that suggestion the most careful consideration?

Mr. Clarke: I can agree to give the proposal careful consideration, but it requires much further debate and discussion. I am grateful to the Select Committee for its report. We shall have an opportunity, through the Bill being presented today by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), to debate those matters in the House. I have an open mind on the subject, although people try to guess my opinion. I have a feeling that the Select Committee's proposal is becoming rather a fashionable cause. We should consider it with care, also taking into account such matters as parliamentary accountability for an increasingly more autonomous Bank of England.

Mr. Bill Walker: Has my right hon. and learned Friend received representations from the Scotch whisky industry, which has been telling me that the sensible treatment of excise duties in the Budget will have a substantial impact on its sales at home? Is he aware that that will increase the revenue to the Treasury and help the position abroad, because it sends the right messages for an industry that exports almost £2,000 million worth of products?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend and I am glad that I was able to follow the precedent set by my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston-upon-Thames (Mr. Lamont) in acknowledging the problems of the Scotch whisky industry and not increasing excise on its products. I hope that the industry will be able to take advantage of that and will recover its strength. I also hope that the industry derives the enormous benefits that could potentially accrue to it from the successful conclusion of the GATT round, which is the best piece of economic news that this and most other trading countries have received in 1993.

Mr. Gordon Brown: After the Chancellor's admission yesterday that the typical family will pay the equivalent of 7p in the pound more in income tax, will he also confirm that the typical family will, from April, be paying £10 a week more in seven separate tax rises and three new taxes? Will he also confirm that, while the wealthiest 1 per cent. received 33 per cent. of the income tax cuts made in the 1988 Budget, middle and lower-income Britain is now paying 95 per cent. of the tax rises from this year's Budget? Are not the Tories now exposed not only as the party of higher taxation, but, as it always has been, as the party of unfair taxation?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman uses what he describes as a "typical family". It is not an average family, but a family that he takes out of the middle ranks of those earning. I have acknowledged that we are increasing taxation. I made an hour and a quarter's speech describing my taxation increases. The hon. Gentleman's mistake is to say that that is the only effect that the Budget will have on the average family. If the hon. Gentleman had his way, he would follow policies that would increase inflation, again increase interest rates—now at their lowest level for 16 years—increase public sector borrowing, slow the recession recovery, reverse the fall in unemployment and probably cause it to increase again, and once more make this country extremely uncompetitive in world markets. That would do far more damage to the ordinary person than my Budget, which sorts out the problem with public finances so that we are clear to have a stronger recovery in the 1990s.

Economic Competitiveness

5. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet his French counterpart to discuss economic competitiveness in Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I met Mr. Alphandery, the French Finance Minister, along with Finance Ministers from the other member states, to discuss European competitiveness at the recent European Council and ECOFIN meetings. I expect that we will discuss this issue further at future meetings.

Mr. Lidington: When my right hon. and learned Friend next meets his French counterpart, will he employ his customary energetic diplomacy to remind the French Finance Minister that an economic plan for Europe which involves higher borrowing, more help for state-funded white elephants and cuts in working hours would not encourage investment, but would cause any potential investor simply to shake his head sadly and take both money and jobs somewhere else?

Mr. Clarke: I think that my hon. Friend is assuming that the French Finance Minister is a bigger supporter of some proposals that come from the Commission in Brussels than he actually is. My colleague Mr. Alphandery is as big a sceptic as I am of some proposals, such as those my hon. Friend listed, that have been emanating from people with less well-judged ideas. The French Government have been imposing some strict austerity measures recently. They are making changes to their social security system to make it affordable and to reduce the costs on their employers. They have reduced their minimum wage for young people because they have found, as we would if we were to introduce one here, that the minimum wage created unemployment among young people. I assure my hon. Friend that my colleague Mr. Alphandery is somewhat nearer to his views and mine than he fears.

Nevertheless, France is not having the recovery that we are. It has a higher level of unemployment than we do and

I think that the French Government are looking with interest at what is happening on this side of the channel and propose to follow many of our measures.

Mr. Hoon: The French Government have obviously decided that the best way of promoting their economic competitiveness is in the negotiations with the German Government on the terms of the creation of a single currency. How does the Chancellor intend to influence those negotiations? Or is he content that Britain should remain on the European sidelines?

Mr. Clarke: We are not on the European sidelines. It is true that at the Finance Ministers' meetings that I attend I am more often in total agreement with the German and Dutch Finance Ministers and usually with the Spanish Finance Minister than with Mr. Alphandery. Nevertheless, Mr. Alphandery and I are agreed on about four fifths of the issues. Last week's debate was based on the Opposition party's crazy premise that all the Finance Ministers of western Europe were sold on the idea of borrowing enormous sums and spending enormous sums to create extra jobs.

I am in complete agreement on currency with the other members of ECOFIN, including the French and the Germans. Now we have to concentrate on achieving convergence in our economic performance to achieve that stability of exchange rates, which will follow. My French and German colleagues are as keen as I am on getting inflation down to the levels that the British are now achieving and on getting public sector deficits down to the level that we are now on course for. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] The gulf exists between the British Labour party and other governing parties in western Europe.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that Europe is increasingly uncompetitive and over-regulated? Does he further accept that the growth in the world will take place outside Europe, in north America, south America and the Pacific rim? When will he create policies for Britain's manufacturing and construction sectors to enable us to take advantage of the real growth outside Europe?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. We must make ourselves competitive with the countries in the Pacific rim and north America that are our rivals in world trade, but that point is increasingly appreciated in western Europe. As my hon. Friend talked about burdens on employers, he will be glad to know that at the recent summit in Brussels it was agreed that we should have an inventory of social regulations that bear down on employers and add to the costs of employment.

Mr. Winterton: At my request and that of the manufacturing alliance.

Mr. Clarke: I am glad that my hon. Friend went ahead of us to ask for that. We regard that as a considerable success in our negotiations.

Mr. Darling: Does the Chancellor accept that taxation and transport links affect Britain's competitiveness? As the Chancellor does not know when, or even whether, the channel link will open and as he put up taxes when the Conservatives said at the previous election that they would not, why should we believe a single word that he or any of his colleagues say at the next election?

Mr. Clarke: We are borrowing more money from the European investment bank than any other member state and investing it in Britain's infrastructure—for example, the Heathrow express, the Jubilee line extension—[Interruption.] They are under construction. Until recently, expenditure on Britain's road programme was about 40 per cent. higher in real terms and railway investment in Britain was 40 or 50 per cent. higher than five years ago. We are investing heavily in our infrastructure and we are ahead of our partners in Europe in developing it using European instruments—[Interruption.] The debate that we had last week was based on the dire proposition of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who had not read the document that he was talking about, that Mr. Delors was offering us some money to build the channel tunnel high-speed rail link. That rail link has not yet been built because it has not been designed.

Mr. Jessel: With regard to economic competitiveness in Europe in the auction of works of art, will my right hon. and learned Friend join me in congratulating my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General on the successful outcome of the long and difficult VAT negotiations, preventing that valuable market from being driven out of Britain and the Common Market to Geneva and New York?

Mr. Clarke: I happily join my hon. Friend in those congratulations. I happened to be there when the final decision was taken in the Council last week, and he is right to say that all the negotiations have been carried out with considerable skill by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General.

Education Expenditure

6. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of total expenditure was devoted to education in 1980-81, 1984-85, 1988-89 and 1992-93.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Portillo): For the years in question, the percentages of total expenditure devoted to education were 11·8 per cent., 10.7 per cent., 11·8 per cent. and 11·9 per cent.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank the Minister for that reply. Does he agree that our spending on education as a percentage of total expenditure is not as high as that of most of our competitors and that, in particular, we have a dismal record on nursery education on which we need to spend far more in order to give our children the best possible start in life?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman heard the figures that I gave, which I do not think he expected, and I spared his blushes by not mentioning that the number of schoolchildren had fallen by 1 million during that period, so that expenditure per child had risen by 50 per cent. in real terms. The hon. Gentleman is interested in international comparisons. He might think that education was of a high standard in Germany and Japan, but the percentage of gross domestic product spent in Germany and Japan was 3·2 per cent. and here it is 4·8 per cent.

Mr. Forman: Is it not abundantly clear from my right hon. Friend's exchange with the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) that my right hon. Friend shot the hon. Gentlman's fox? Is it not equally clear that the Government believe in investing in human capital and have had consistent policies to that end over the past 15 years? Are they not right to insist that those who benefit directly from higher education should bear a greater proportion of the burden?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend is well placed to comment on those matters. He knows that we have increased the proportion of our young people in higher education to about one in three, which is a rise from one in eight in 1979. He also knows that the number of young people participating in further education will increase by about 250,000 in the next three years.

My hon. Friend says that it will be right for students to bear a greater share of the burden. We certainly believe that where the state provides means-tested help for students' maintenance, it is right that students should make a greater contribution by taking a greater proportion of their funding through loans that are repayable if they find employment at about the average level of earnings. I am sure that that is fair and just. It enables us to make that enormous increase in educational provision.

Mr. Andrew Smith: How on earth does the Chief Secretary square what he has just said with the reports of his views that the target of one in three need not be met and that the country does not need that many graduates by the year 2000? He believes in putting the right-wing dogma of cutting expenditure over the needs of education. He said that he wanted to impose the cost of education on students. Does not that show that he puts the dogma of right-wing Tory ideology over the need for investment in education and opportunities?

Mr. Portillo: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman what I think is important. So far, all the discussion has been about how much money we are putting into education. There should also be a discussion about the quality that we get out of education, the number of people whom we educate and the qualifications with which we put them into the outside world. The hon. Gentleman cited certain of my views. If he has the documents in which I stated them, he should lay them on the table. If not, he should stop indulging in gossip.

Balance of Payments

8. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the prospects for the balance of payments.

Mr. Portillo: Unit labour cost performance is excellent and competitiveness has been much improved. In spite of weak activity abroad, the trend in the visible deficit is downard, with exports at record levels.

Mr. Arnold: Does my right hon. Friend agree that that performance is a considerable tribute to British exporters? Will their performance not be further enhanced by the successful outcome of the negotiations on the general agreement on tariffs and trade, into which the Government have put so much effort in recent months?

Mr. Portillo: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in particular, has been a major force in pressing for the most liberal outcome to the GATT negotiations. The GATT outcome is estimated to be worth $270 billion to the world economy. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the President of the Board of Trade have put great emphasis on that benefit to the world economy. That benefit far outweighs the individual difficulties of countries. Although we well understand those difficulties, they are definitely less important than that benefit.

My hon. Friend refers to the benefits to British industry. Earlier, my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) spoke about the Scotch whisky industry, which exports £2 billion-worth of its products and faces tariffs of 30 per cent. in Japan, of 250 per cent. in Singapore and of 20 per cent. in New Zealand. The GATT deal is set to sweep away those tariffs progressively, which is good news for British industry.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: Is the Minister aware of the deep concern in South Yorkshire about the state of the engineering and steel industry? Yesterday, United Engineering Steels, which is one of the United Kingdom's prime exporters and at the core of United Kingdom industry, had to shed 400 jobs. That company is convinced——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must ask a direct question now.

Mrs. Jackson: My direct question is: what will the Government do that they did not do in the Budget to support this country's core manufacturing industry, so that the jobs of highly skilled workers and engineers in our constituencies are not lost?

Mr. Portillo: The House heard my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor say earlier that unemployment fell last month. It fell across the country and, incidentally, it fell in Sheffield.

The engineering industry depends on the success of other British industries, for instance, our car industry. As a result of the competitive conditions that we have sustained in Britain, we are attracting the bulk of investment into the European Community. That is because we have maintained competitive rates of taxation and that, in turn, is because we have imposed restraint on public spending. British industry has responded magnificently, improving its productivity in manufacturing by more than 4 per cent. in the past year and reducing its unit wage costs, while those costs have risen in Japan and Germany. That has given British industry a real competitive edge. The hon. Lady should be celebrating that, not carping.

Mr. Jenkin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the prospects for our balance of trade have significantly improved since we withdrew from the exchange rate mechanism a little more than 12 months ago? Does he further agree that if we were to enter a single currency in the EC, which would involve huge costs to sustain both it and the disparities in the EC, Britain would be made less competitive and it would be bad for our balance of trade?

Mr. Portillo: The prospects for our balance of payments have been altered in recent months. I do not know whether my hon. Friend is aware that the deficit for 1992 has been revised downwards, from £12 billion to £8·5 billion, and that our forecast for the two years ahead has also been revised down, from £17·5 billion to £9·5 billion in 1993 and from £18·5 billion to £9·5 billion in 1994.

I believe that the really important factor is not any change from moment to moment in the exchange rate but the underlying improvement in competitiveness which is due to higher productivity and the control of unit wage costs. A single currency is not currently on the European agenda.

Inflation (NHS)

9. Ms Lynne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what account he took of the level of national health service inflation in determining his allocation of resources to the Department of Health.

Mr. Portillo: The Government reached a view on the appropriate level of national health service spending, taking into account the GDP deflator and the scope for efficiency improvements.

Ms Lynne: Is the Minister aware that the British Medical Association says that the real inflation figure in the national health service is 3·9 per cent? Does he agree that the announcement in the Budget will therefore lead to a decrease in NHS spending power?

Mr. Portillo: I calculate that in the year ahead the NHS will be able to treat 4 per cent. more patients than this year. Once again, I urge the hon. Lady and other hon. Members to concentrate on outputs, not inputs. Surely what matters is how many people get treated, not how much money gets put in.

The hon. Lady underplays the tremendous scope in the NHS for improving efficiency. Last year, the northern region was able to increase its efficiency by nearly 4 per cent., as was the Oxford region, with the west midlands region only a little behind—the Mersey region was very close, too. For all those reasons, we can increase both efficiency and the number of patients who are treated.

Mr. Marland: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the way to solve a problem is not necessarily to throw money at it but to get better value for money? Is he aware that the NHS trusts in Gloucestershire are doing just that? Gloucester Royal hospital will treat nearly 250,000 people this year—it is a trust. The Gloucestershire ambulance service, also a trust, is continually improving its service to patients, too.

Mr. Portillo: The reforms that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and her predecessors have introduced have transformed the ability of the health service to provide efficient health care and to ensure that ever more patients are treated well and efficiently. The hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) was wrong to talk about a rate of inflation in the health service. Inflation in the health service is largely a matter of pay in the health service. That pay is under the control of management in the health service, and so it should be.

Taxation

10. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact of the average family's tax bill of all the increases in taxation announced in his Budget last month.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): On average, the main tax-related changes proposed in my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget will cost households around 90p a week from April 1994 and an additional £1·80 a week from April 1995.

Mr. Jones: Is the Minister aware that, during the election campaign, my constituency was covered with posters announcing the so-called "Labour tax bombshell"? Since then, there has been a Tory tax explosion. Will the Minister explain why his party lied during the election about its tax proposals?

Mr. Dorrell: We saw earlier this afternoon the exact nature of that Labour tax bombshell. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) stood at the Dispatch Box and called for increased public expenditure without giving the House any indication of how he intended that expenditure to be paid for. We will listen to the Labour party on the subject of lower tax when it tells us how it would finance its spending programmes.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list official engagements for Thursday 16 December.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Callaghan: Is the Prime Minister aware that, exactly one year ago, a man who was suffering from mental illness climbed into a paddock of a zoo and was savagely mauled by lion? Despite the public dismay and concern over that incident, there are still thousands of mentally ill people who are tramping the streets of our major cities. They often live in cardboard boxes and are unable to look after themselves. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that is a national disgrace? Will he tell the House what action he will take to get those people off the streets and into places of care and protection?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman knows, a great deal of action has been taken—most noticeably in London—to get many people, both those suffering from the ailment to which the hon. Gentleman refers and others, off the streets. That has been remarkably successful, and we will continue with that policy.

Mr. Lamont: Does my right hon. Friend recall his admirable speech at the Conservative party conference in which he said that the Union between Ulster and Britain was of immense importance to the Conservative party? Did not that echo his comment during the election that he stood with passion and commitment for the unity of this country? Is my right hon. Friend aware that that stands a little oddly beside his statement that this country has no strategic interest in Northern Ireland? Will my right hon. Friend therefore declare today that he believes in the Union, that he wants it to persist and that he believes it has been in the interests of the people of this country?

The Prime Minister: I do not believe that it stands remotely oddly with the joint declaration which I set before the House yesterday. The joint declaration reaffirms in unmistakeable terms the commitment that we have consistently given to the people of Northern Ireland, and I reaffirm that again now.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Prime Minister agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer who told the Treasury Select Committee yesterday that the tax increases in this year's Budget were the equivalent of an increase of 7p on income tax?

The Prime Minister: What my right hon. and learned Friend said yesterday was that the aggregate sum of money raised after three years would amount to a crude equivalent of 7p. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, that takes no account of growth in the economy and many other matters. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman talks about taxes, perhaps he might contemplate some of his proposals for new taxes. He is committed to eight more taxes, without any indication of how he would fund his spending promises or meet the debts that occurred as we helped vulnerable people through the recession.

Mr. John Smith: Does not the Prime Minister realise that the Chancellor told the Select Committee yesterday that the increases would amount to between £15 billion and £17 billion? Is there anything more crude than promising not to increase taxes before an election and putting them up by £15 billion afterwards?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman clearly does not realise that he is referring to the cost of Budget measures over the next three years. He is obviously deficient in understanding and has produced an entirely spurious one-off tax increase. I can understand why. I quote what the acting general secretary of the Fabian Society wrote about the right hon. and learned Gentleman in the "Labour Review". [Interruption.] I hope that the Opposition will laugh in a moment because this is what was written about the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his party:

> "If the characteristics being exhibited by the Parliamentary Labour Party were translated into the conduct of a single individual, she or he would certainly be in therapy."

Mr. John Smith: May I put a straight question to the right hon. Gentleman. [Interruption.] I know that his party does not want to hear it. Does he deny that before the last election, the Conservative party promised not to increase taxes?

The Prime Minister: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman deny—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] Does he deny what his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said about unemployment? He has had nothing to say today about unemployment, nothing about inflation and nothing about the eight taxes to which he is committed. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must settle down. I want to hear the Prime Minister. [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: The Opposition do not, because they will not like it. Let us hear from the right hon. and learned Gentleman about his proposed taxes on tourism and development, his payroll tax, his education tax and the fact that he wants to have the same level of corporation tax as our competitors in Europe. What about his pollution tax and his windfall tax? The man does nothing but propose new taxes day after day.

Mr. Richards: Is my right hon. Friend aware that small businesses in my constituency are absolutely delighted with the Chancellor's Budget and that, together with low inflation, low interest rates and increasing confidence, they are looking forward to a period of steady growth in the foreseeable future?

The Prime Minister: I have no doubt that that is the case. It is largely the growth and success of small businesses that are bringing down unemployment, and have been doing so month after month throughout this year. When unemployment figures go up, that is the only issue that concerns Labour Members. When those figures start coming down, apparently it is matter of no importance whatsoever.

Mr. Ashdown: May I draw the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that 1·25 million people are close to starvation in beleaguered central Bosnia, many of whose lives will be further put at risk in the bitter cold yet to come if the local power station at Kakanj is allowed to cease operations? Is he aware that, without vital supplies, that will happen in 20 days' time? Is he further aware the vital supplies provided by Britain are now being blockaded by the Serbs and Croats? Will the Prime Minister see what urgent action could be taken to make the provision of those vital supplies a test case for the Geneva convention on free passage of convoys so that those lives could be saved?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we are committed to the aid effort through the winter. We have made it clear, to pick up a point that will concern many hon. Members, that we still need to see the opening of Tuzla airport. We have so far provided more than £150 million-worth of assistance, and more than 2,300 troops are delivering that assistance, day after day, under the most difficult conditions. We are examining what we can do to deal with the present difficulties in Bosnia. The co-operation of parties on the ground will be needed to enable us to deliver the humanitarian assistance that we are prepared to deliver and fund. Throughout the conflict, our record has been second to none, and we will continue to do all that we can to ensure that people receive supplies throughout the winter.

Mr. James Hill: My right hon. Friend knows that the economy is beginning to emerge. We are reducing unemployment every day and there will be more money in the coffers by the time of the next Budget. Does he agree that more money must be allocated by the Treasury to the Home Office to enable the pledges given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to be carried out, not only on the neighbourhood watch security patrols but on the numbers of police required? In Hampshire, for instance, we asked for 120 extra police and were given only five this year. Does my right hon. Friend agree that all those measures are part of the Conservative philosophy and that, in the not-too-distant future, money will be available to fund them?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary announced measures not very long ago which, if carried out, will enable approximately 5,300 police officers to move from dealing with administrative work out to the front line to deal with the matters that my hon. Friend mentioned. That action has been taken within the expenditure levels agreed by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary.

Q2. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 16 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer that I gave some moments ago

Mrs. Prentice: Does the Prime Minister agree with the Chancellor on the subject of stopping tax abuse? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said in his Budget speech that claims that more money might be found in that way were much exaggerated. Does the Prime Minister agree with the Public Accounts Committee, which found another £1 billion tax loophole for the aristocracy? Would not the Chancellor be better employed closing such tax loopholes than stinging every family in the country for an extra £10 a week as a result of his tax-raising Budget?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady should know that my right hon. and learned Friend closed a number of genuine loopholes in the Budget. That will yield about £2 billion over the next three years. The loopholes so beloved of the Opposition Front Bench are not loopholes generally but measures such as ending relief on capital gains inheritance—which would leave less for parents to hand down to children—and reforming the rules applying to non-domiciled status foreigners, which is the Opposition's latest idea. All the main parties agreed, when that measure was reviewed in 1989, that the existing rules should remain because they made Britain an attractive business location.

The Opposition's loophole campaign is a smokescreen to hide the fact that they have no idea how to fund their policies. They are trying to convince people that they could do so by closing tax loopholes, but what they would do is take away measures that assist industry and introduce those that would cost jobs and assist our competitors.

Mrs. Angela Knight: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the general agreement on tariffs and trade provides important trade opportunities, not just for countries such as Britain but for developing countries? Removal of the trade barriers will give them the chance of export-led growth to benefit their economies and bring about prosperity.

The Prime Minister: Yes, I entirely agree with that. My hon. Friend will know that, at the Commonwealth conference, we agreed that a number of Commonwealth countries—including less-developed and developing countries—would send a mission to the main Governments around the world in the GATT negotiations, to ensure that there was a satisfactory settlement. I noticed yesterday that Malaysia, on behalf of the less-developed countries, had hailed the round as a victory for common sense.

Q3. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 16 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Worthington: Why have the Government put 7p on income tax, or its equivalent?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is clearly not very good at listening, or he would have heard the answer a good deal earlier, but I will tell him what the Government have done.

The Government have got interest rates down to the lowest levels for 16 years; inflation at the lowest level for 26 years; unemployment falling, while it rises everywhere else in Europe; growth that is faster than in any other country in Europe; a GATT deal to benefit industry; retail sales up; and a whole range of other economic improvements. That is the Christmas message to bring a smile to people's faces next year—not the misleading questions asked by the Labour party.

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): With permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to make a statement on the successful conclusion of the world trade negotiations.

In Geneva yesterday, trade negotiators from 117 countries reached the most wide-ranging agreement ever. After seven years of long, hard and often fraught negotiations, it is a superb outcome. It is a result for which industry, commerce and consumers alike have pressed; it is a conclusion for which this Government have worked tirelessly through many crises, when protectionism threatened British markets and British jobs.

The new GATT settlement will help British industry by bringing down barriers to exports of manufactured goods and services. It will give manufacturers greater protection against piracy of their copyright, patents and designs. It will bring down prices for consumers—particularly of food, electronics and other manufactured goods; and it will strengthen the world trading system against unfair practices by individual countries.

Britain is the fifth largest exporter in the world of goods and commercial services. We export more per person than either the United States or Japan. Our markets are already among the most open. We stand, therefore, to be one of the biggest gainers from cuts in worldwide tariffs, quotas and other restrictions.

Sharp reductions in some very high tariffs in the United States and Japan will help Britain in strategic markets. The overall tariff reductions, across all countries of the world, will be around 40 per cent. An independent study by McGraw-Hill has indicated that a new GATT agreement could add up to 4 per cent. to our national output, generating up to 400,000 extra jobs over the next decade.

The European economies, as a group, are estimated to be the biggest single gainer; so the GATT deal can be expected to give a much-needed boost to confidence and recovery in our biggest export markets.

As late as last weekend, there was a real and frightening danger that negotiations might unravel. The world faced a choice between a retreat into protectionism, slump and higher unemployment, and free trade, growth and jobs. Happily, the right choice has been made. The director general of the CBI has rightly called this outcome

"a momentous and welcome event".

This Government have fought consistently to keep the negotiations going. It has been a long struggle. Last year, we faced the prospect not only of failure, but of a lurch into trade war between Europe and the United States.

Exports from Europe were threatened by new and punitive American tariffs. We were able to use our presidency of the European Community to get both sides back to the negotiating table and make progress on farm trade. We encouraged the new United States Administration to extend congressional authority in order to permit the GATT round to be concluded. We pressed for the agreement on tariffs at last summer's Tokyo summit —another crucial meeting and another crucial building block in the final result.

At this autumn's Commonwealth summit, we launched a special mission to all the key Governments of the developed world. This sent the clearest possible signal on behalf of one quarter of the world's population that free trade was a prize for developing countries too. Trade, more than aid, is the most certain route to economic development.

I believe that very great credit is due to Sir Leon Brittan, the European Community's negotiator; and to Peter Sutherland, the director general of GATT. But others have played a crucial part, including the United States negotiator, Micky Kantor. All three had the courage to take on their tasks at a time when it was far from certain that they would be rewarded by success.

Let me outline the main features of the agreement. First, excellent progress has been made on industrial goods but final details are still being worked out. A number of our largest export markets will move towards the total abolition of tariffs in industries which include pharmaceuticals, steel products and spirits. For example, the Scotch whisky industry, which already has exports totalling about £2 billion a year, will benefit from the complete abolition of Japanese tariffs.

Cuts in high United States tariffs on scientific equipment, chemicals, steel and ceramics, for example, will help in one of our biggest markets. Our textile manufacturers will gain from tariff cuts in the United States, and gain greater access to many economies along the Pacific rim.

Secondly, for the first time agriculture will be fully covered by GATT rules. Tariffs are being cut and subsidies reduced substantially, offering families in this country the prospect of lower prices of staple foods. In Europe, we have already begun the process of reducing farm production subsidies. Overall, those subsidies cost every family around £20 a week. The changes to the common agricultural policy which are already agreed, should—if passed on to the consumer—over a period lead to price cuts equal to 20p off a pound of beef or 6p off a pound of butter. Under the GATT agreement, other countries—notably, Japan and the United States—will now have to cut their agriculture tariff subsidies as well.

Thirdly, for the first time we have an international set of rules for free trade in services—the fastest growing sector of the world economy. Services account for two thirds of our output in the United Kingdom but only about one quarter of our exports; so, if we can break down barriers to trade, there is great potential for growth. The services covered range from insurance to consultancy. Many countries have made commitments on financial, telecommunication and transport services. This is only a start. Further negotiations with the United States must follow on maritime and financial services. But in the meantime we have maintained the City of London in a position in which it will attract new international business.

Fourthly, with regard to so-called intellectual property, the law of the jungle still rules in too much of the world. Expensive research and development by British pharmaceutical companies can be pirated—in effect, stolen—by countries which offer no protection for patents. The same is true of Britain's record industry, which estimates that as much as half of its market in the developing world is stolen by pirates. For the first time, we now have an agreed set of international rules on which we can begin to rely in our fight to give these industries the markets which they have a right to expect.

Free trade increases the need for businesses to be internationally competitive, but in Britain, we have world-class companies ready for the challenge. This new GATT settlement removes the threat of collapse in the world trade system—a system on which economic growth has been based for nearly half a century. It extends the benefits of trading rules into vast new areas of business. It brings further welcome reductions in tariffs on British goods. it is a platform for recovery, growth and jobs in Britain, the European Community and the rest of the world. I commend it to the House.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I thank the Prime Minister for his statement. The Opposition also welcome the successful conclusion of the Uruguay round. It has been a long and torturous negotiation, but the result, although long overdue, is an important step forward for the world economy. Having had responsibility for the Tokyo round, I know how difficult and detailed such negotiations can be.

Preserving an open and fair trading system is vital for growth, jobs and prosperity not just in this country but round the world. The dangers of beggar-my-neighbour protectionism must always be resisted.

The GATT agreement is, however, only a start. Does the Prime Minister agree that, for Britain to succeed, we must put far more effort into promoting our export performance in manufacturing and services? Will the Government recognise that following the deal, it is now even more vital that we invest in people and in their skills to ensure that we succeed in international trade by competing on the quality of the goods that we produce and the skills of our work force rather than on low wages and a self-defeating spiral of low skills and poor job security?

On the details of the Geneva agreement, I welcome the new agreements on intellectual property, which tackle the piracy of counterfeit goods and provide security for British companies that invest in the research and development of new products.

On the failure to reach a settlement on trade in financial services, is it the case that access to trade in those services in the United States will remain restricted? That is clearly a matter of considerable concern to the financial services industry in Britain. What steps do the Government intend to take to push forward negotiations to include financial services fully within the GATT framework?

On the environment, will the new Multilateral Trade Organisation be given a remit to recognise the importance in the modern world of linking economic development with environmental protection?

What changes have been made to the Blair house agreement to accommodate French agricultural interests? Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the deal in no way prejudices the urgent need to continue to reform and control the costs of the common agricultural policy? In relation to the proposed MTO, which will supersede the GATT secretariat, are we satisfied with the procedures for trade disputes? Can we be assured that the MTO will cover concerns for environmental protection and fair employment standards?

Does the Prime Minister agree that steps should also be taken to strengthen the role of the International Labour Organisation, and in particular to encourage enforcement of its conventions on fair labour standards and especially to help stamp out child labour? Although we welcome the benefits to consumers at the prospect of reduced tariffs on textile imports, surely no one in this country wants to buy products made by children in sweatshops that have no concern for basic human rights.

Although GATT offers important trading benefits for the developing world as a whole, do the Government recognise the special difficulties for Africa, which will probably gain little from this specific agreement? For that reason, can I urge the Government and the international community to do much more to reduce and write off the outstanding debts of the poorest countries? While trade is vital to the expansion of the world economy, can more be done to encourage new lending, investment and official aid so that all regions in the world can participate in the economic growth that we hope will occur?

The Prime Minister: Let me deal with the specific points that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) has raised.

On the question of promoting exports, I am delighted to tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that, at present, our exports are running at record levels. As he will know, we have provided more extensive and cheaper export cover to assist our export promotion. We have reorganised most of our overseas postings to ensure that greater assistance is given to British business men abroad.

A large number of trade missions have been led by senior Ministers and others in the Government, most of whom have come back with substantial order books. At the moment, we are examining what further measures can be taken to provide an even better service for our exporters in the future. I have no doubt that, with the reduction of tariffs overseas and the increased scope in services and in manufacturing, there is a remarkable opportunity for British companies, at a time when they are competitive and in a position to take advantage of that opportunity. We shall certainly proceed with that.

I share with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the regret that we did not get further on financial services, because it was not possible for the various countries to agree on a final conclusion. Some progress has been made. The sector is now covered by trade rules and there have been a number of major gains for United Kingdom companies. For example, United Kingdom banks and insurance companies will be guaranteed the right to do business in Canada on the same basis as United States and Canadian firms, although it is disappointing that a fuller result for that sector has not been achieved. We have fought hard to ensure that openness in the European Community market will be maintained and we won that battle in Brussels.

There is no question that development will be at the expense of the environment, and I do not believe that anyone seriously imagines that that will be a problem.

There were detailed renegotiations on Blair house at the margins some time ago. There were no changes to the Blair house agreement as a result of the European Community meeting over the weekend and expenditure on the common agricultural policy will be restrained under the ceilings that were agreed at the Edinburgh summit, in terms of the financial perspective of the Community.

I do not have any quarrel with the outcome on the trade dispute mechanism. I do not have the same affection for the ILO as the right hon. and learned Gentleman—that is a difference between us, as I am sure that he knows—but I share his views about child labour—[Interruption.] I am about to tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman precisely what has been done about it, if he will listen. The activities of child labour lead to dumping. In the Community we have powerful mechanisms to act against dumping and they were improved so that action could be taken more speedily at the Foreign Affairs Council yesterday, which was attended by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

As for Africa, it is the view of the African states that this GATT round is of assistance to them. They made that perfectly clear at the Commonwealth conference where a large number of African states, both rich and poor—[Interruption.] Hon. Members may be interested to know that those members of the Commonwealth wholly support the outcome of the GATT round. The area of greatest difficulty, as the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), who is not in her place, has said, is sub-Saharan Africa. As I said to the hon. Lady, if it turns out that the sub-Saharan countries face particular difficulty, our long historical connection means that we shall certainly do what we can to provide further assistance, both bilaterally and in other ways.

To ensure that they get further assistance with their debt, Opposition Members may be aware of the Trinidad terms initiative that I launched in 1989-90, which is by far the most generous write-off of debt that the world has ever seen. We have written off a large amount of debt under than and we are still pressing some people in the Paris Club to do so. I believe that we shall be successful. It is the view of the countries that benefit under those Trinidad terms that it is by far the most comprehensive and most generous write-off of capital and revenue debt that has ever been proposed and carried through.

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is a long time since the start of the negotiations, when I spent a happy week in Punta del Este with Mr. Alan Clark, among others? He has not yet described it in his diaries. May I congratulate my right hon. Friend and his colleagues on the achievements of the British delegation? I especially congratulate Sir Leon Brittan, as my right hon. Friend rightly did, and we must not forget Mr. Arthur Dunkel, who was the director general of GATT for many years, and who was a tremendous support in the early days of this round.

In agreeing with my right hon. Friend about the importance of the conclusions to trade throughout the world and to prosperity, may I ask him to say a little more about what will happen to financial services? At the start of the negotiations, the American delegation was among the keenest that there should be freedom of trade in financial services. What has happened? Are there now proposals to proceed with the negotiations at a later date in some other forum? What will happen on financial services? It must be very much in the interests of Britain, as well as of many other delegations, that the process should not come to an end and that further steps should be taken.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my right hon. Friend about that point. He is right in his supposition that there will be further negotiations on financial services; I hope that they can be carried forward speedily. It is unsatisfactory that we did not get further on financial services on this occasion. Having voiced that disappointment, I believe that one should not lose sight of the fact that this is by far the widest and most comprehensive world trade settlement, with large areas previously not within GATT now brought within it. It provides for a much more liberal world trading system and it is the biggest single advance in free trade for many years.

My right hon. Friend speaks with some knowledge of the matter. He was Minister for Trade and President of the Council of Ministers during the early stages of the GATT round. I join in his congratulations to Sir Leon Brittan and to Arthur Dunkel. They can both be proud of what they have achieved.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The Prime Minister is right to say that this is a good day for the world and a good day for Britain. However, is it not the case that, for Britain to take advantage of increasingly open world markets, we shall have to do much more to build a high-value-added, high-investment, high-skill economy than has been done so far under this Government?

The Prime Minister is right to welcome the extensive debt write-off and the development assistance. However, if third-world countries are to have access to the opportunities that the end of the Uruguay round has presented, more attention will have to be paid to that area.

Many people will have greatly welcomed the Prime Minister's comment to the leader of the Labour party that he recognised that development damaged the environment. Does he, therefore, agree that almost the first task of the new Multilateral Trade Organisation should be seriously to consider environmental factors and the means by which we can incorporate environmental costs into the world trading system?

The Prime Minister: The fact that our exports are growing at a remarkable rate while overseas markets are very flat, especially in the European Community, suggests that to an extent greater than that for which the right hon. Gentleman gives them credit, our British exports are adding substantial value and are penetrating markets deeply as a result. One illustration is the German market. It is in substantial decline at the moment, yet British exports to Germany have increased; we have taken a much larger share of a much smaller market. That is substantially because of our competitiveness and because of the high-value-added nature of so many British exports.

There is sometimes a tendency—I do not attribute this to the right hon. Gentleman—to think especially of manufacturing in the old sense of large, labour-intensive manufacturing industries. In the constituencies of almost every hon. Member, there are now small, medium and high technology businesses which are, in essence, manufacturing industries. They now export around the world, not least to such places as Japan, against very stiff competition.

I agree with the right hon. Gentleman about debt write-off. The original Toronto terms, introduced by Lord Lawson when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Trinidad terms have been well ahead of what the rest of the world was prepared to contemplate in terms of debt write-off at that time.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the third world. One of the most comprehensive ways in which we can help countries in the third world is not to close our markets to their exports. That is why I welcome so much of the Uruguay round outcome. It opens markets to the third world to a far greater extent than ever before. The outcome is not perfect; it does not go all the way. However, it does a great deal more than ever before and offers substantial incentives to third-world countries to develop their exports.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the enormous effort that he has put into the agreement which is of great benefit to Britain. Does he agree, however, that there is considerable resentment in this country at the intransigence of the French, who demanded compensation for their farmers from the Community budget as a condition of agreeing to the GATT talks? Will he tell us how much that that will cost the EC budget, and what our proportion will be?

The Prime Minister: A number of countries during the round were pretty intransigent from time to time, although perhaps the difficulties faced in France got rather higher profile publicity than most. I know that the GATT agreement has caused the French Prime Minister considerable domestic difficulties. I do not particularly wish to add to them now. It is worth looking at what the agricultural agreement does: it reduces Community tariffs by 36 per cent. and cuts exports subsidies substantially. That was the essence of the Blair house agreement, and that has been maintained despite what may be said in other capitals.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Where does the British aerospace industry stand? What is the fate of the airbus? Why was the issue of aerospace taken out of GATT? Is the vendetta by the American President against airbus now over?

The Prime Minister: The reason why those aspects of civil aviation were taken out of the round at the last minute was simply that agreement on them could not be reached. But the British aerospace industry will continue to be covered by the present Community and United States bilateral arrangements. That means that the position stays as it is now and that it has not—as the hon. Gentleman and many others feared—been worsened by the outcome of this round.

It has been agreed that the Community and the United States will now negotiate for another year. I should say, for it might reassure the hon. Gentleman, that the United States has agreed to negotiate on the basis of the GATT Committee chairman's draft text, which currently provides for a reduction in United States indirect support for its industry. The Commission, as our negotiator, will continue to insist on the inclusion of aero engines and indirect support. The outcome should protect United Kingdom interests. The hon. Gentleman need have no doubt that we will press our negotiators very firmly on that point.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): My right hon. Friend will recall that my constituency in Leicestershire has many farmers and many people who are engaged in the knitwear, hosiery and textile industries. Does he recall that, following the Tokyo summit, he informed the House about his hopes for a reduction of the United States tariff barriers for British textiles? Will his hopes that we shared when he returned from Tokyo be realised following the GATT agreement? I join other hon. Members in congratulating him and his team, particularly Sir Leon Brittan, in their achievement.

The Prime Minister: The changes to the textile industry are helpful, but not as helpful as we expected them to be when we returned from Tokyo. The changes since Tokyo have meant that the extremely favourable changes that we had then are now less favourable. Securing improved market access for our textile exports was a priority for us in the negotiations.

The agreement that the industry negotiated some months ago improved market access. We have been able to build on that in the Uruguay round and significant cuts have been agreed in a number of United States textile peaks. That is very valuable for our textile exporters and it is something that they have long sought. That is undiluted good news. It is not as good news as it looked as though it would be after Tokyo. Good news it is; superb news it is not.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Prime Minister explain the phrase "unfair practices" which, according to his statement, are controlled under GATT? Does it, for example, include any control of child labour, or is he relying entirely on anti-dumping practices? He should know that, when dealing with the EC, most industries find it dilatory and inefficient in dealing with anti-dumping practices. Should not GATT have a social clause to give people in other countries health and safety at work rights, and trade union rights to ensure that they are employed under proper and decent working conditions? Are we not exploiting workers and child labour badly in order to receive their products in this country?

The Prime Minister: As I said in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, just today the Community improved its mechanisms for dealing with dumping, in terms of producing a more speedy response. I share the hon. Gentleman's view that, sometimes, across the Community, it has taken longer to respond to dumping than might ideally have been the case. I believe that that was corrected in the agreements made by my right hon. Friend the other day. We are trying to deal with the problem. The other circumstances that he set out lead to goods being produced and then sold at below the proper world market level. That is the definition of dumping, so I believe that we shall catch the practices about which the hon. Gentleman is concerned.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): I add my congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on what has been achieved, particularly in agriculture, heralding as it does the end of competitively subsidised dumping on the world market and, we hope, the gradual phasing out of price support and the iniquitous set-aside scheme with which we in Europe have got stuck. While I recognise that it was probably inevitable, although regrettable, that the French had to be bought off with extra compensation, if necessary, for their small farmers, will he ensure that not only does that not exceed the guidelines already laid down for expenditure but that it is not paid out at the expense of compensation already agreed for British farmers?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps I should make clear to the House what happened with the French over the weekend. No agreement to provide the French with what I saw described in one Sunday newspaper as "billions of pounds" was made last weekend. The agreement reached was that the ceilings on expenditure in the Community will remain as agreed at Edinburgh before the Blair house agreement was renegotiated. The view of the Commission, and most of the member states, is that the GATT agreement is compatible with common agricultural policy reform, so the question of extra compensation will not arise.

Even if it were to arise, it is agreed that there is no question of increasing the sums of expenditure. It is a free expression to suggest that there will be billions of extra pounds for French farmers. That flatly is not the case. When asked, after the conclusion of the European Council, whether French farmers had won extra money during the Council, I replied, "Not a penny." I reply again, "Not a penny."

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): I congratulate the Prime Minister on his recognition that sub-Saharan Africa will benefit little if at all from the GATT negotiations. That is a positive start. Will he look at the wretched rules of origin, which cause so many difficulties for such countries as Guinea-Bissau and Guinea-Conakry in terms of the export of their agricultural and fishery products?

The Prime Minister: I am not familiar with the details of that problem, but I shall seek advice on the rules of origin and have a look at them. To pick up the earlier point about the poorest countries—as I said, a large number of them are sub-Saharan countries—19 of them have benefited from the reduction of $1·75 billion of their debt, under the Trinidad terms.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Is European culture really such a pathetic withering little flower that it needs protection by the state? If French films are so good, surely people will flock to see them without state intervention. While the role of Great Britain and the Prime Minister in securing the GATT round was crucial, is it not a shame, given that we believe in free choice and open markets, that we backed that French demand which, in whatever sophistry it is cloaked, is nothing more than an unpleasant combination of censorship and protectionism?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, we would have preferred to have reached an agreement on audiovisual matters. A number of others would have preferred such an agreement to be reached. It was not possible. In the circumstances, the only option to protect the gains in the round was to take the audio-visual matters entirely out of the GATT agreement. Like my hon. Friend, I regret that. I hope that we can negotiate a satisfactory arrangement soon.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): Given the Prime Minister's earlier answer to the question on the aerospace industry, can he tell us how small aircraft will be affected? There is a potential problem with Jetstream in the Ayrshire area. Will the Prime Minister assure us that that matter will be included in any negotiations with the United States?

The Prime Minister: Small aircraft and engines are included in the discussions. As I understand it, until those discussions are concluded there is no change from the present position.

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that this settlement of the GATT round comes at a crucial time to give the world economies that extra boost to get them moving again and that, as he has said, we shall benefit from it? Will he use his influence as Prime Minister to continue to encourage through the export services with the President of the Board of Trade the many—rather too many—small and medium-sized companies that could but do not yet export? If their hand were held a little, they might do that much better.

The Prime Minister: On that last point, my right hon. Friend and his colleagues are making a special effort through the business link scheme to do precisely that. My hon. Friend touches on an important point. One should make it clear that the GATT round now having been agreed is not immediately implemented. There will be a ministerial signing session, probably in April 1994. The final Act will need to be ratified by a number of countries. Then it will come into force, probably in late 1995 but conceivably as late as the beginning of 1996.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): How can everybody be with us? There are 113 countries that have signed the agreement. Some are bound to be losers. Why does not the Prime Minister admit that the multinational companies are the driving force behind GATT? Britain will be gatted. Of the top 500 multinationals, 278 are either in the United States or Japan and the rest are divided between all the other industrial countries on the Pacific rim. It is a joke if the Prime Minister is trying to convey to the people of Britain that we will benefit. He said the same when the multinationals wanted the common market in 1973; unemployment increased. He said the same about the single market four years ago; again unemployment increased——

Madam Speaker: Order. This is not the time for speeches. This is the time for questions. If the hon. Gentleman has a question to put to the Prime Minister, he should do so and then sit down and let us hear the answer.

Mr. Skinner: Why does not the Prime Minister answer this question: since Britain's manufacturing base is now down to 4 million, how on earth can this country leap across the boundaries to increase production? Why does not the Prime Minister tell the truth about what he said about jobs the other day? When I asked him how many jobs had been created, he said 400,000. Already he has stretched the number.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has taken leave of what passes for his senses. I said 400,000 the other day and I said 400,000 today. He should get his facts right for a change. He is wrong again on other matters. Not only is he wrong, but he does not seem to carry with him his hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) or the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), who have said precisely the reverse.

The Prime Minister: If anybody else were as confident about anything as the hon. Gentleman is confident about everything, we would all be rather well off. I for once am prepared to make common cause with the hon. Member for Livingston. I entirely agree with him when, in welcoming the GATT trade deal, he said:

> "This will create substantial opportunities for developing countries."

Not only does the hon. Gentleman think that, and he is entirely right, but so do the developing countries. But they, of course, also know less about their interests than the hon.

Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). If perhaps the hon. Gentleman had listened a little more carefully—he clearly did not listen the other day about jobs either—he would know that the developing countries in the Commonwealth sent a number of representatives to the main capitals to say how important it was for them to have a GATT agreement. Every single thing that the hon. Gentleman said was copper-bottomed, gold-plated rubbish.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I warmly welcome the successful outcome of the Uruguay round and pay tribute to the Government for the role that they have played in bringing it to a successful conclusion. Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is a downside to this agreement—he referred to it when answering some supplementary questions earlier? Does he accept that, if Britain is to be successful and competitive, it is important that for industries such as textiles and clothing—I could name others—the Government assist by providing an investment incentive? Will my right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade do what they can to put pressure on the Treasury to ensure that there are incentives for investment so that British industry can take advantage of the Uruguay round and its successful outcome?

The Prime Minister: We certainly wish to ensure that British manufacturing industry both invests and exports. While my hon. Friend is right that the outcome for the textiles industry was less satisfactory than we had hoped it would be some time ago, the successful conclusion to the round does include a reduction in tariffs in the United Kingdom's main export textiles markets, most crucially, of course, in that of the United States. Therefore there is a better circumstance for textiles, but, as my hon. Friend implied, it is not as good as we had hoped it would be.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Does the Prime Minister accept that there will be a general and warm welcome for the decision to reduce tariff barriers against Scotch whisky—an important, high-quality export-winning product, not least in my constituency, where so many jobs depend on it? Is the Prime Minister aware that there is a need to build on the agreement to eradicate the internal excise discrimination in Japan, which continues to breach the 1987 GATT agreement because shochu is protected by a much lower level of tax than Scotch whisky? I believe that the differential between the two products ranges between six and nine.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady is right on both points. The tariff reduction on whisky in Japan is from 250 per cent. to zero—it has gone entirely. That is only part of the barrier against Scotch whisky exports in Japan. There are still substantial internal tax barriers. I raised those with Prime Minister Hosokawa when I was in Tokyo some time ago and we wrote to him again last week. We hope to see some movement in the comprehensive tax reform that the Japanese Government are now planning. The present position on internal tax discrimination against Scotch whisky is not satisfactory, and the Government continue to pursue it with the Japanese Government.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the successful conclusion to the GATT round, which is a great success for Britain, particularly Conservative Britain which believes and is foremost in free trade. May I press my right hon. Friend on the common agricultural policy? We all believe that the CAP is far too heavy and costs far too much. In many respects, that may have restricted our negotiating position on the financial services area. Will he assure hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members, that we will now press further for greater reductions and a greater freeing of the financial services business in the world?

The Prime Minister: We shall certainly press for greater freeing of financial services. It is very much in our interests. We are one of the world's great providers of financial services, and the more that we can open up European markets—which is now happening—and Japanese and United States markets in particular, the greater the opportunity for the export of British financial services. My hon. Friend is quite right: it is a matter of critical interest to us and I give him my undertaking that we shall pursue it.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): May I pursue the downside a bit further and refer the Prime Minister to the McGraw-Hill study that he mentioned earlier? What did the study say about identifying the sector of British industry that can now anticipate job losses, and what will be the scale of those job losses?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the net position is estimated to be a growth over 10 years of around 400,000 jobs. Beyond that, it is not really possible to identify in any great detail where there will be growth and contraction. That depends on too many factors for the statistics to have any real value. The calculation of 400,000 jobs is derived from the growth of world trade generally and the implications that that will have for manufacturing industry and the service sector in particular.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I compliment my right hon. Friend on his mastery of his brief this afternoon. Many countries gain an unfair competitive advantage by subsidising their exports. Did the new GATT settlement deal directly with that hidden barrier to free trade?

The Prime Minister: Yes, there are new rules on subsidies, anti-dumping and safeguard action. There are texts in all those areas to deal with unfair practices. They are a good outcome for Britain in particular, and the EC more generally. Disciplines, including a reasonable constraint on developing countries, have been tightened, but the texts are a great improvement on the current GATT rules.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): If, as the Prime Minister claims, the Government champion free trade as a means of helping the developing world, why did Britain abstain in the recent overwhelming vote at the United Nations condemning the United States Government for its illegal and inhuman economic blockade of the Republic of Cuba?

The Prime Minister: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman is comparing like with like. I do not know of any country that would deny that this Britiash Conservative Government is one of the most free-trading Governments, in philosophy and practice, of any Government in the world. I am pleased to see the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) nodding in agreement. He may not necessarily approve, but he does agree.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): Will my right hon. Friend accept my congratulations on his outstanding statesmanship during the past two days? Does be accept that his earlier comments on aviation policy suggest that the advantage of current levels of launch aid for aircraft manufacturers who manufacture planes of 100 seats or fewer will remain despite strong USA pressure to do away with that? Does he further accept that my constituents will warmly welcome that on the basis that Jetstream Aircraft is a manufacturer of turbo-prop aircraft?

The Prime Minister: I can confirm that there will be no change and I reiterate that the Commission will continue to insist on the inclusion of aero engines and indirect support. As I said a moment ago to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe), the outcome should be to protect the legitimate interests of the United Kingdom industry.

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I share the Prime Minister's relief at the outcome of the GATT negotiations and his view of the need to reduce support and subsidies for agriculture, but how does that square with the fact that, on 15 November this year, the Government agreed to an increase of half a billion pounds in the draft EC budget for 1994, most of which will subsidise agriculture? Will the Prime Minister give us a clear commitment that there will be no extra support for French agriculture, either within the guideline or otherwise, and that, if there is any prospect of such support, it will not be transferred from other areas of the EC budget, such as the structural fund that is designed to encourage employment?

The Prime Minister: A number of other countries apart from the United Kingdom, such as Spain, Portugal and Greece, would strongly resist any suggestion that money to support agriculture should come from the structural or cohesion funds. In our discussions at the weekend at the European Council, Prime Ministers of some of the southern states made it perfectly clear that, were there any suggestions from any of the northern states—it would certainly not come from this northern state—that money to fund agriculture should come out of the structural or cohesion funds, they would strongly oppose that, and they would be right to do so.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Is not the consequence of the GATT that third-world countries will be able to earn far more foreign exchange for themselves and therefore far more self-respect? Is not that better than the begging bowl approach so favoured by the Opposition?

The Prime Minister: Yes, my hon. Friend is right. Independent calculations are that the gain to developing countries from opening markets under these GATT round considerations will be greater than the total amount of aid from all the western democracies and Japan added together.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): With all the euphoria following the GATT, may I remind the Prime Minister that, some ten years ago, there was a traumatic upheaval in the British steel industry, when many thousands of people were made redundant and whole communities were decimated? The same development does not appear to have taken place in Germany, France or Italy, where subsidies still abound. When will the Government take firm action to look after our steel industry and prevent further redundancies?

The Prime Minister: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not draw the conclusion that most other people would have drawn, which is that British Steel is now a world-class company trading profitably because it is under private ownership. I hope, therefore, that there will be a good deal of support from Opposition Members in future for the privatisation of industries. The large number of industries that were in the public sector and very expensive to taxpayers are now in the private sector yielding resources to taxpayers.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but we must now move on.

Business of the House

4.21 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the business for the first week back after the Christmas Adjournment.

TUESDAY 11 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill.

Money resolution relating to the Non-Domestic Rating Bill.

WEDNESDAY 12 JANUARY—Proceedings on the Non-Domestic Rating Bill.

Motion on the Insider Dealing (Securities and Regulated Markets) Order.

THURSDAY 13 JANUARY—Opposition Day (First Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, subject to be announced.

FRIDAY 14 JANUARY—Private Members' Motions.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committee B will meet at 10.30 am on Wednesday, 12 January to consider European Community document No. 6625/93 relating to special rehabilitation support programmes in developing countries.

In the spirit of Christmas, not to say Jopling, even though neither has been much in evidence this week, it may assist the House to know that, subject to the progress of Bills, it will be proposed that the House should rise for the Easter Adjournment on Thursday 31 March, until Tuesday 12 April.

[Wednesday 12 January:
Relevant European Legislation Committee Reports: HC 79-xxxiii (1992-93); HC 79-xxxix (1992-93).]

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I thank the Lord President for fulfilling his undertaking to give us an Opposition day in the new year, and the dates of the Easter recess. Will the Lord President warn the Home Secretary that, when it comes to debating the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill, Members on both sides of the House, with the exception of the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), will be anxious to discover whether—contrary to assurances that the Home Secretary seemed to give in the Queen's Speech—the Government intend to use that Bill to make sharp cuts in the compensation paid to victims of criminal violence? It will be of particular concern, at least on this side of the House, if we discover that Ministers have misled the House on such an issue.

Will the Lord President confirm that his announcement about the handling of the Non-Domestic Rating Bill implies that the Bill will be put through all its stages in one day without agreement? The Opposition regard that as a further dangerous precedent, all the more so because it is completely unnecessary.

We recognise that the Bill may not be controversial —although, as it has not yet been published, we must trust the Government on that matter. However, it will affect every British business. Whatever problems hon. Members may have in scrutinising such legislation, people outside suffer most when Bills are not handled properly.

I remind the Lord President that, of the last two Bills on this subject, one was given 13 days in this place and six weeks in all, and the second 15 days and two months in all, from start to finish. There are still three months before this Bill needs to be on the statute book, so, on the basis of experience, the argument that there is some pressure does not stand up.

I am convinced that many people in local authorities and in business will not thank the Government for this speed. The Bill will hardly be here before it is gone again, and they will have had no time to look at it.

May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, finally, to press the Secretary of State for Social Security to come here as soon as possible to respond to the Select Committee report on the Child Support Agency? Does he realise that Christmas is being ruined for thousands of British families because of fear and uncertainty caused by the operations of that agency? It really is not good enough for the Government to drag their feet over this.

Mr. Newton: I assume that the right hon. Lady's thanks for the Opposition day debate were also made in the spirit of Christmas, for which I am grateful.

The White Paper giving details of the new tariff scheme for criminal injuries compensation—to answer the right hon. Lady's point about the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill—was published yesterday, and doubtless she will have studied it. Our scheme is the most generous in the world. I understand that we pay more than all other European Union countries put together.

As for the Non-Domestic Rating Bill, local authorities are under a duty to send out their bills in good time, and it is important that they know in good time what bills they are to send out, so as to avoid uncertainty for businesses and to avoid the risk that authorities might send out bills on one basis and then have to send out another set of bills on another basis. I do not accept the right hon. Lady's presumptions about the leisurely way in which the House can deal with this matter. It is our hope that the House will deal with all stages of the Bill on Wednesday 12 January.

The last such Bill took only two and a half hours on Second Reading and 20 minutes for its remaining stages —that is to say, less than three hours. On the proposal that I have announced this afternoon, there would be about twice that much time. We shall see whether the Labour party wishes to proceed in a way that meets the convenience both of business and of local authorities.

The right hon. Lady will know that the Secretary of State for Social Security is carefully and urgently examining the report of the Select Committee on the agency—and other representations that he has received —but I cannot at this moment give an undertaking about the timing of a statement.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Is the Leader of the House aware that it is now nine months since we had a debate on agriculture? Did he note that, during the Prime Minister's statement on GATT and subsequent questions, there was no mention of the effect on farms, farmgate prices or farm incomes? Is he aware of the considerable concern among all hon. Members about the likely impact on agriculture of the GATT deal, whatever its other benefits?

Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us of an opportunity to debate early-day motion 134, standing in the names of members of my party and dealing with the hill livestock compensatory allowances?

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Hill Livestock (Compensatory Allowances)

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

(Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 2924), dated 29th November, 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 30th November, be annulled.]

He will know that many Members from the hill areas are anxious about the effect of all these proposals on hill communities.

Mr. Newton: I shall of course bear the hon. Gentleman's request in mind. There may be some opportunity to discuss with his party how to handle the matter, although, at the moment, because of the Labour party's position, it is not open to me to discuss it in the usual way through the usual channels. I understand his point, and I will take it into account.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): May I welcome the announcement that the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill is to have its Second Reading on the first day back? Is my right hon. Friend aware that a number of us hope to table a Back-Bench amendment to the Bill on the age of consent for homosexual acts, as we wish to see that changed? Could my right hon. Friend tell me whether it will be possible, under the long title of the Bill, so to do with an amendment that will be in order? Can he assist us by telling us whether we can have a full day's clear debate on this important issue, with free votes at the end?

Mr. Newton: Madam Speaker, you at least will have registered that my hon. Friend, in her characteristically engaging way, is inviting me in one answer to usurp your prerogatives and those of the Chief Whip. I hesitate to do so, but I am sure that you and he will take account of her request.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Is the Leader of the House aware that yesterday's GATT announcement, on which we have just spent a great deal of time, coincided with the announcement of further appalling job losses in the special steel works of South Yorkshire, which are among the best in the world? Is he aware of any concern among his colleagues on the Treasury Bench about the fact that those job losses have been caused by the subsidy of our German and Spanish competitors? Those competitors, with their Governments, seem determined to take out our superior capacity, despite the existence of the powerful weapons to which the Prime Minister referred.

Do not the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues understand that, as our vital and strategically important industrial base disappears, this country will become little better than a banana republic, and that most people will not be able even to afford tropical fruit?

Mr. Newton: I do not for a moment accept the points which the hon. Gentleman made towards the end of his remarks. He will know that the Government have made clear their views about the issue of subsidies to other steel industries within the European Union. He will also know of the range of measures which the Government have taken, the most recent being their efforts to achieve a successful outcome of the GATT round. That is designed to improve the competitiveness of this country and the opportunities for our production to be exported.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): In the spirit of Christmas, as invoked by my right hon. Friend, will he save me from being pestered by the press and ensure that the Government give some response to the first report of the Procedure Committee on the Select Committee structure for Northern Ireland, which was published in the first week of December? Would it not be helpful if my right hon. Friend could ensure that the Government did something about it as soon as possible?

Mr. Newton: First, I express my gratitude—and, I am sure, that of the House—to my right hon. Friend and the Committee for the work that they did, not just on that report but on the Committee's earlier reports on these matters.

I am happy to inform my right hon. Friend and the House that, having regard to the report's conclusions, the Government have decided to embark on consultations with other parties on the basis that the time for a Northern Ireland Select Committee has now come. The House will be made aware of the outcome of those consultations in due course. In the meantime, I am sure that the House will welcome the intention to increase parliamentary accountability for the affairs of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Since it was the Leader of the House's PPS who prevented the House from debating Ferranti—a tragedy that puts at risk many thousands of jobs—will he arrange for a ministerial statement before we rise? Clearly there would have been a ministerial statement in that debate. Can we have that statement before the close of play tomorrow?

Mr. Newton: I cannot give any such undertaking to the right hon. Gentleman. I would make the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) was also denied an opportunity of debate by the tactics which were pursued by the Opposition earlier in the evening. I understand that the Chair pointed out at the time that what my hon. Friend did—he is as entitled as any other hon. Member to the procedures of the House—was no more than what had been done by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) on Friday.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the actions of British Coal at Wearmouth colliery in Sunderland? British Coal closed the pit and offered it to be leased to the private sector. However, British Coal is daily making the pit less attractive to private colliery companies by removing vital roof supports and coal-cutting equipment for which British Coal can have no possible use.

Although British Coal does not understand it, the colliery has a bright future in the private sector, which would safeguard jobs in the mining engineering industry in my constituency, and lead to the re-employment of many colliers in Sunderland.

Mr. Newton: That is an operational matter for British Coal, which has given assurances that no equipment will be removed unnecessarily. In view of my hon. Friend's concern, I will draw his point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 284 concerning the life of Manuel Salazar, who is on death row in the United States?

[That this House is appalled that the death penalty has been passed on Manuel Salazar, a Mexican American, following the death of a police officer at Joliet, Illinois, in September 1984; notes that Salazar was unarmed and had been beaten by the police officer who subsequently died when his own gun went off; notes that after Salazar fled to Mexico he was illegally and forcibly returned to the United States of America where he was sentenced to death in 1985; notes that the Illinois Supreme Court is to hear arguments for a re-trial following the emergence of new evidence but is disturbed that the Attorney General is opposing this and asking for an execution date to be set; is further disturbed that his case is also before the Mexican courts for violation of his rights there by US agents; and therefore requests his release and return to Mexico.]

Does he recognise that many people in Britain are revolted by the prospect of the execution of a man who was illegally brought from Mexico to the United States? Will he convey that concern to his right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, so that the revulsion of millions of people in Britain at the use of the death penalty can be passed on to the United States Government?

Mr. Newton: I will certainly bring those sentiments to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, but so far, in all the circumstances, the British Government have not considered it appropriate to seek to intervene in that particular case.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): My right hon. Friend will be aware that at least two Labour Members have cited GATT as a reason for debate on other subjects. As it is so important to the British industrial sector, will he give us some idea of when we will have a debate on GATT itself?

Mr. Newton: I cannot at present give my hon. Friend such an indication. Obviously, we will have to consider that, in looking at the business after the first week back that I have announced this afternoon. I will bear her request in mind. Meanwhile she may like to note that right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will be answering questions on the first Wednesday back.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Will the Leader of the House consider finding time for a debate on water quality and the cost of cleaning up the water supply? Many of my constituents are concerned not only about the cost of water but about the subsidiarity arrangements recently negotiated by the British Government, which they feel will lead to a reduction in the quality of their drinking water. It is an extremely important issue.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady is labouring under some misapprehension if she thinks that the consequence of decisions in the subsidiarity context is expected to reduce the quality of British drinking water, which is very high. The issue is the pace at which further improvement can be assessed in a way that is manageable for the industry, not least for the consumers who have to pay for them.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Bearing in mind that there are more manufacturing jobs in the London borough of Ealing than in any other London borough, may I again press my right hon. Friend for a debate rather than a statement or questions and answers on GATT, as it has central importance to jobs in my constituency and the borough I represent?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend manifestly can press me, and has pressed me, on that issue. I will, of course, take account of his pressure, but I cannot respond more than that this afternoon.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): May I welcome the response of the Leader of the House to the question from the Chairman of the Procedure Committee? In the season of good will when there is great emphasis on the needy, can we have a debate in the very near future on our overall contribution to the Overseas Development Agency, bearing in mind there is still great need in the developing countries despite the hopeful bonus from the GATT?

Mr. Newton: Many people on both sides of the House would welcome an opportunity to debate that subject. Again, I will bear it in mind, but I cannot at this moment give any specific undertakings.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Is it possible to have a debate on the antics of Labour-controlled Lancashire county council, which is currently instigating a judicial review to prevent the local Government inquiry into the structure of local government from proceeding? The action is being driven by the leader of Lancashire county council, who is power-mad and waving the charge payers' cheque book around. It is estimated that the cost may be about £500,000, when that local authority is for ever saying how strapped it is for cash. We should have a debate as soon as possible.

Mr. Newton: I hope that my hon. Friend's remarks will be registered by those in Lancashire who in due course will have further opportunities to vote in local elections. Meanwhile, the Government have successfully resisted the application for an injunction. The review programme is unchanged, the reviews are going ahead and we shall certainly contest Lancashire's arguments for judicial review.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen): May I draw attention to early-day motions 260 and 261?

[That this House notes the SIB inquiry into the mis-selling of personal pensions to members of occupational pension schemes, but also notes with concern that a third of all personal pension schemes are cancelled within two years leading to the loss of investors' savings, that many individuals have been encouraged to opt-out of SERPS for inappropriate personal pensions, and that the churning of investment schemes including endowment mortgages, has been widespread in recent years leading to further losses for savers; and, therefore, urges the Government to establish an inquiry into the regulation and management of the personal financial services industry.]

While today's news that the Treasury Select Committee will investigate the sale of personal pensions to occupational pension scheme members is welcome, does the Leader of the House accept that that is just the tip of the iceberg? Some £200 million a year of savers' money has been lost through the early cancellation of pension funds, and there has been a widespread mis-selling of personal pension schemes to members of the state earnings-related pensions scheme. Will the Leader of the House find an early opportunity for a major debate on the regulation and management of the personal and financial services industry?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman takes a close interest in these matters, and he knows that the extent of non-compliance is being thoroughly investigated by the Securities and Investment Board. A proper time for such a debate would be when we have the results of its inquiries. The board has the full support of the Government in its inquiry, and the Chancellor has made it clear that he expects the review to be conducted quickly, and appropriate remedies put in place.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Will my right hon. Friend find time in the near future for a debate about the responsibilities of employers for employees? I am a member of the Employment Committee and I am not bothered if I have to remain in the House until 4 o'clock in the morning, but the staff of the Palace of Westminster were also kept here until 4 o'clock this morning by the machinations of Opposition Members. The business being conducted was so important that at least 30 or 40 Opposition Members bothered to remain until 3 o'clock:

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot understand what the hon. Gentleman is asking for. Will he make his point clearly to the Leader of the House?

Mr. Robathan: I am asking for a debate on the responsibilities of employers towards employees, to ensure that female recorders and women who work in the Tea Room are not kept in the House until the small hours of the night by the machinations of Opposition Members. We had one hour's nonsense from one hon. Member, and another Opposition Member claimed to see strangers. He should get more glasses. It is hypocritical of the Opposition to say that they care about the rights of employees. They do not consider the rights of the employees of the House, but treat them all in a cavalier fashion.

Mr. Newton: I hope that members of the Opposition Front Bench, and other Opposition Members who contributed to those proceedings, will consider what my hon. Friend has said. I regret the inconvenience caused to the staff of the House—not least because the public outside will regard it as not a very sensible way for the Opposition to behave and for the House to conduct its affairs.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): Returning to the question of GATT, will the Leader of the House give an assurance that that very important treaty will be debated? It is extraordinary that the French Parliament and the United States Congress can debate and vote on it. Surely the House can at least debate it?

Mr. Newton: I have made it clear that I will bear in mind the various requests that have been made for a debate on GATT. I do not dismiss them, and I will take into account what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Will my right hon. Friend find time for an early debate on the economic and social implications of investment in transport infrastructure? This would enable me to draw attention to the real economic advantages that the widening of the M5 has brought to my constituents in Worcester, and also the disadvantages it has brought to its neighbours in the villages of Whittington and Norton as a result of the noise generated because of inadequate soundproofing on the motorway.

Mr. Newton: I will draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I know from experience in my own constituency that one of the problems with road schemes is that, when advantages are brought to one part of an area, disadvantages are brought to another. But I cannot promise an early debate on that matter.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Will the Leader of the House, over the Christmas recess, look at the arrangements for Question Time? He will have seen today that neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the Prime Minister answered questions directly, particularly the questions about the £9 a week increase in taxes for the average family. Instead, they started asking questions of the Leader of the Opposition and the shadow Chancellor. That was quite ridiculous.

I have been in the House for fourteen and a half years, and I have seen Question Time deteriorate. I go to seminars for the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and tell the Members of Parliament of newly democratic countries that Question Time is the time when the Executive is accountable to Parliament. That is clearly less and less the case. Will the Leader of the House look into the matter and report to the House when we come back in January?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Procedure Committee not long ago undertook some consideration of questions. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I am about to. I was here when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was answering questions. I thought his answers were a model of precision and clarity. I have never heard the Leader of the Opposition answer any question at all.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): The House would welcome an early opportunity to debate local government in inner London. Many of my hon. Friends would welcome an opportunity to demonstrate that the worst councils—in terms of empty houses, poor collection of the council tax —[HON. MEMBERS: "Rates."]—and the provision of services—are councils controlled by the Opposition parties. They are a nightmare for the people of London.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point, and the reaction of Opposition Members shows the embarassment they feel when complaints are made. I will look for an early opportunity to debate the matter, but not before Christmas.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As to criminality, will there be a statement from the Home Secretary about why a person being deported from the United States —who is unfortunately a British citizen—will be allowed to come here? That person is being deported because he was involved in Nazi mass murders and the killing, in April 1942, of two Soviet prisoners, apart from other things.

It is not wrong that Britain should be considered a safe haven for such war criminals? Bearing in mind the fact that the chances of a prosecution under the War Crimes Act 1991 are remote, his United Kingdom citizenship should be cancelled and he should be told that under no circumstances will we allow British soil to be contaminated by his presence.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman knows the answer. That person is a British citizen, and we have no choice but to accept him if he returns here. Any allegations that he has committed criminal acts will be investigated in the same way as allegations against any other British citizen. That is the right way to approach the matter.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): Will my right hon. Friend find time, early in the new year, for the Secretary of State for Transport to report to the House about the outcome of his Department's review of the crossrail project? I hope that the Crossrail Bill will be able to proceed without delay through the remainder of its Committee stage.

Mr. Newton: I will bring my hon. Friend's request to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will the Leader of the House give some Christmas cheer to my embittered constituent Kevin James, who, when he was a serving soldier in Northern Ireland, was severely injured in a bomb blast which killed his companion, Bombardier Wells, and two children? He has had a demand from the Child Support Agency for £1,000, and it has doubled his maintenance payments, which he cannot pay because he has no disposable income.

Can we have a debate on the agency so that I can ask the Prime Minister why, in Mr. James's terms, when he has put his life on the line "for people such as John Major", he is now being ruined by the same man? How is he going to help his ex-wife if he can no longer afford to travel to the north of England to see his children or to buy them Christmas presents?

Mr. Newton: As the hon. Gentleman will understand, I am not in a position to comment on a specific case. He will have observed, however, that my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Social Security and the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People are both present; I am sure that they will look into the matter.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): Will my right hon. Friend allow some time early in the new year for a debate on procedures of the House, particularly to discuss the methodology by which the Opposition parties could put down amendments to Treasury motions? Clearly, the whole issue needs to be simplified for those on the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Newton: I have already said that it might be appropriate for someone to run a seminar for the Opposition dealing with the tabling of amendments to Budget motions. [Interruption.] I am not sure whether it would be appropriate for me to do that; but those who now sit opposite me muttering may care to seek further advice.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Does the Leader of the House recall the critical remarks made by his hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh), who accused the Prime Minister of political funk for sitting on the report on the privatisation of the Post Office for more than a year? Is it not a tragedy that the chairman of the Post Office has felt it necessary to speak out publicly, and in a highly critical way, against the Prime Minister and the Government, because of the drift and uncertainty surrounding the Government's proposals for the future of the Post Office?

Is this not the clearest possible example of circumstances in which a debate is urgently required—in this instance, a debate on the future of a national institution?

Mr. Newton: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Government's position in relation to the review of the Post Office, and the consideration that they are devoting to it —which, clearly, must be conducted very carefully—is well known. I do not propose to add anything further this afternoon.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): May I thank my right hon. Friend for providing, in considerable detail, the programme for the first week after our return in January? Would it not have been equally helpful to hon. Members if the subject of Thursday's debate had also been announced by the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett)?

Mr. Newton: Yes, it would. It would also have been quite nice if someone had thanked me for my early warning of the dates of the Easter recess.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): The Leader of the House has announced a three-week Christmas recess. Will he spend at least one day of that break brushing up his knowledge of parliamentary procedure, of which he has shown a worrying lack of grasp in his answers today—especially in his response to my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), who referred to the Prime Minister's poor performance at Prime Minister's Question Time?

The right hon. Gentleman said that, in all his time as Leader of the House, he had never heard the Leader of the Opposition answer a straight question. Will he try to understand that the Prime Minister's function is to answer the questions, whereas the function of the Leader of the Opposition is to ask them? May I make him fully aware that any Opposition Member would be delighted to swap places whenever he likes? We will answer the questions, and we will form the Government of the country, and we will answer those questions incredibly more effectively than the right hon. Gentleman does now.

Mr. Newton: Not for the first time, the hon. Gentleman is all over the place. I did not have in mind the role of the Leader of the Opposition at Prime Minister's Question Time; I am well aware of the position in that regard, and I understand what the hon. Gentleman was saying. I have sat through a good many debates during which the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) has been asked how he would pay for his spending programmes, and I have never heard an answer.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): Will my right hon. Friend consider making time available for a full debate on the methods by which the House makes the European Community accountable to Parliament, and to the Parliaments of the other member states? Is he aware that, when European Standing Committee B—of which I am a member—meets on 12 January, it will discuss a motion relating to the special rehabilitation support programme, and a document that will already have been agreed in the Council of Ministers? Any opinions that we express to the Minister therefore cannot be taken into account.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is not satisfactory? Do we not need to review the way in which we scrutinise the huge quantity of legislation that flows out of the European Community, so that we can have the Europe of nation states that the Prime Minister wants, rather than being dragged into a federal system?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will be well aware that, in recent years, substantial improvements have been made in the way in which such matters are conducted, in order to improve accountability. Obviously, I would not rule out further improvements if there are clear ways in which they can be made. Meanwhile, my hon. Friend might have welcomed the clear gains represented by the further progress made very recently at the Brussels Council in giving reality to the concept of subsidiarity.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement to be made—either by the Secretary of State for Health, or by the Minister responsible for health in Scotland—regarding a letter that I have received from a junior Minister, the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), who is Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland?

According to that letter, incinerators in national health service hospitals—or trust hospitals—can now possibly be used to burn commercial or toxic waste. Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a ministerial statement to clarify the matter, and to back up what the Minister said? I understand that he has now denied it to certain newspapers. I am concerned about that, because I have a letter in which he says clearly, in black and white, that those hospital incinerators can now burn toxic waste commercially.

Mr. Newton: I will bring that request to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I am sure that he will seek to reassure the hon. Gentleman in any way he can.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford): First, may I thank my right hon. Friend profusely for giving us advance warning of the business that we will debate when we return?

Two weeks ago, when we were given notice of a debate prior to the meeting of the European Council, I told my right hon. Friend that I thought there would be a problem because not all the documentation was available, and that in any case there was a huge amount to study before the debate. As he will recall, last Thursday it turned out that some of the main documentation had not arrived until Wednesday afternoon—which gave us less than a day in which to study a 7 in pile of documentation.

I suspect that, if he looks at Hansard, my right hon. Friend will agree that the quality of the debate was very poor—with some exceptions. People had not had enough time to study the documents. Will my right hon. Friend take account of that, and look for some way in which we could have acquired that documentation earlier?

Mr. Newton: I shall not attempt to comment on every document. My hon. Friend will know, however, that when a debate is to take place near the date of a Council meeting, we depend to some extent on the arrival of the necessary documentation from the Commission, or from other appropriate bodies. He will also be well aware—it has been widely reported in the newspapers—that my right hon. Friends have made clear their own view on the late arrival of very important documents from the Commission for the Council itself.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Is the Leader of the House aware that, earlier this week, The Sun carried the story that thousands of jobs were available in California for British workers, involving the rebuilding of homes that had been destroyed in the fire? Is he aware that, misled by the story, some British workers actually went to California, only to discover that they were not allowed to work without the necessary permits—and that, in any case, the jobs did not exist?

Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the Minister to make a statement to the House setting the record straight, before any more British workers suffer as a result of the lies in The Sun?

Mr. Newton: I will bring the matter to the attention of, perhaps, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. On the other hand, I hope that the hon. Gentleman's complaint will be heard and noted by those responsible for the original story, who might then consider it appropriate for them to correct it.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): In view of the procedures adopted by the Opposition to disrupt the Government's business, has my right hon. Friend had any talks with the deputy Leader of the Opposition about the Jopling proposals—or are those proposals even less likely to be implemented now?

Mr. Newton: I have had a number of exchanges of various kinds with the right hon. Lady. It has manifestly not been possible so far to make the progress that I would like. It is, perhaps, for the right hon. Lady to say whether she is prepared to engage in any further efforts; but the Opposition's current stance is that they are not talking to us at all.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Some highly disturbing information has been hidden in the Library rather than being published in Hansard. It shows that only 95 per cent. of those eligible to be included on the electoral register in England and Wales are currently registered. Moreover, that includes many people who should not be registered, as they died during the process of registration or have moved away.

When we return from the Christmas recess, should we not have a debate about the state of electoral registration in this country, so that we can discuss the development of a proper procedure to secure maximum registration? We are in danger of having not only a partial Parliament that hardly ever meets, but a partial electorate.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will have at least one opportunity in the first week back to raise that point, because the Home Secretary is here for questions on Thursday 13 January.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 281.

[That this House notes that at Prime Minister's Questions on Tuesday 14th December the Prime Minister stated that there were over a thousand grant-maintained schools, Official Report, column 826, whereas the true number is 708; further notes that on the same day at education questions the Secretary of State for Education claimed that month after month including the last three months, the ratio for opting out was 8:2, whereas the correct ratio is 6:4 at a time when ballots have fallen by two-thirds; and calls on the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Education to make a statement to the House correcting these serious errors of fact which might mislead honourable Members into repeating them inside and outside the House.]

I have attempted to put right in a parliamentary publication factual inaccuracies made by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Education during Question Time on Tuesday. The Prime Minister mistook the estimate of grant-maintained schools as 1,000, when in reality it was 708, and the Secretary of State for Education could not tell the difference between a ratio of 8:2 and one of 6:4.

If the Leader of the House cannot bring them to the House to set the record straight, will he at least send the Prime Minister back to school so that he can get a better grasp of number, and send the Secretary of State for Education back to school so that he can learn to speak English in a much clearer fashion?

Mr. Newton: I suspect that the mathematical confusion may be in the hon. Gentleman's mind, since I understand that parents at well over 1,000 schools voted in favour of grant-maintained status, and applications from 840 of them have already been approved. Obviously, the exact proportion for and against varies from month to month, but taking the whole period since balloting began in 1988, the proportion has remained more or less constant at around eight out of 10.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the United Nations convention on the rights of the child, especially article 34, which calls on all states to take effective action to protect all children from sexual exploitation. In the light of that, I ask the Leader of the House to read the article in The Mail on Sunday, which highlighted the disturbing growth of child prostitution in Nottingham.

On the assumption that this is an all too sad reflection of what is going on in major cities up and down this country, can I ask the Leader of the House to find time for a debate on child prostitution in British cities, the inadequacies of current British law in terms of penalties against men who draw children into prostitution and the over-stretched nature of resources available to work with those children?

Mr. Newton: In one sence, I probably can promise the hon. Gentleman a debate, first, in fairly general terms and, no doubt subsequently if he wishes, in more specific terms. Of course, the first business in the first week back is the Second Reading of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill, to which such matters would clearly be relevant.

Points of Order

5.3 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I should be most grateful if you could clarify a point of order which arose during business questions. You will have heard the Lord President asked about the handling of Prime Minister's questions, and you will have heard him say that he had never heard the Leader of the Opposition answer questions, as though that were in the context of Prime Minister's questions.

Will you place it on record and beyond doubt, first, that Question Time—whether for the Prime Minister or any other Minister—is to enable Government policy to be scrutinised by the House; and, secondly, that it would be out of order, and you would take a most serious view, if Labour Members sought to give answers instead of asking questions at that time?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Madam Speaker, certainly with deference to you—I am not quite sure about the right hon. Lady—I made my position on that absolutely clear in response to a question asked from the Back Benches only a few moments ago.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek your guidance about Prime Minister's Questions today. While Prime Minister's Questions are normally noisy, it struck me that there was a concerted attempt by Opposition Members to drown the Prime Minister so that Tory Members could not hear him. I wonder whether you think that that is a breach of privilege.

Madam Speaker: Many hon. Members enjoy themselves during Question Time, and it is my wish that we have less noise during those exchanges.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin) rose——

Madam Speaker: No, let me deal with the point of order raised by the right hon. Lady.

The way in which we conduct our parliamentary system is for the Executive to be accountable to Parliament and to answer questions, whether through parliamentary questions, statements or exchanges during debate. That is the whole basis on which our tradition has been built. The Executive are responsible to Parliament and the House for their conduct of policy.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Does it relate?

Dr. Godman: No, it is an entirely different matter, on which I seek your advice.

Yesterday, the statement concerning the joint declaration on Northern Ireland was aided by the placing of copies of the declaration in the Vote Office so that all hon. Members had access to the declaration to which the Prime Minister referred, understandably, in a very liberal way. It seems that a useful precedent was created. This is where I seek your guidance.

When Ministers make statements relating to documents, especially comprehensive ones, it would be useful if those documents could be placed in the Vote Office at an early time to enable hon. Members to read through them, as we were able to read the declaration yesterday.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. At present, the Procedure Committee is investigating this matter to see whether it can be dealt with as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Madam Speaker: As hon. Members are aware, this matter is raised with me at least once a week. For the moment, it is for the discretion of Ministers as to whether documents are available. I am delighted to hear that the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Procedure Committee is looking into the matter.

Orders of the Day

Social Security (Contributions) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Madam Speaker: I must make it clear to the House that I have not selected the amendment.

5.10 pm

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The House will be aware that the Bill concerns the national insurance fund, which provides finance for the range of contributory benefits, the most notable of which is the retirement pension, but which also includes widows' benefits, sickness, maternity and unemployment benefits. Nearly half the total expenditure on social security is met from the national insurance fund—more than 80 per cent. is contributed by employers or employees and less than 20 per cent. is made up by Treasury grant.

The thrust of the Bill is to increase employee contributions by 1 per cent. I recall that the great Irish-born statesman, Edmund Burke, who contribued so much to political thinking in general and particularly to thinking within the Conservative party, once said:

> "To tax and to please . . . is not given to men."

If I cannot bring pleasure to the House, I hope that I will at least be able to persuade hon. Members that what we are proposing is both a rational and a prudent measure for the Government to take at this time.

The other day the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) reminded me of my previous appearance, about a year ago, at the Dispatch Box in connection with a social security contributions Bill, when I referred to the concept of a contributory scheme being firmly embedded in the collective mind of our nation. That leads me to believe that most people will recognise that at a time when benefit expenditure is still expected to rise and contribution income is not keeping pace with cyclical pressures, an adjustment in contribution rates should be made. It is implicit in the contributory principle that contribution rates will fluctuate either up or down.

It is worth reminding the House that the contribution increase proposed in the Bill is the first since 1983. The Government reduced employees' contributions in 1985 and again in 1989. Both changes were particularly targeted at helping lower-paid workers. After the 1 per cent. increase has been set, many people will still pay less from next April than they would have done under the flat 6·5 per cent. which applied under the Labour Government.

The Government, of course, have no money of their own. They simply redistribute money collected through taxes and contributions in the way that Parliament prescribes. It is self-evident that no one would volunteer to pay extra contributions or taxes. Last year, we avoided an increase in national insurance contributions by introducing the facility for a Treasury grant to the fund to help sustain its balance.

The House will be well aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has found it possible to announce the full uprating of all benefits for 1994-95 in line with inflation, as well as extra help with fuel costs for pensioners, widows and people receiving invalidity benefit. For the national insurance fund alone, that help will take expenditure to about £40 billion in 1994-95, an increase of about £1 billion on this year's expenditure.

Income to the fund from national insurance contributions is not, however, keeping pace with expenditure. For instance, if contributions were kept at existing levels we would continue to spend between £4 billion and £5 billion more on benefits than our net contribution receipts. As the House will be aware, the Social Security Act 1993 introduced the facility for a grant from the Treasury to the national insurance fund. The grant will continue to be an intrinsic part of our strategy for balancing that fund, but we nevertheless consider it right that, in the medium term, contributors should be expected to bear a somewhat greater proportion of the cost of benefits rather than taxpayers generally being expected to make up all the deficit.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for displaying his characteristic courtesy in giving way. Is it his Department's intention to publish an explanatory leaflet about the details of the increases which would be available to anyone who is affected by the Bill? If so, will he seek to explain to all employees the obligations of the Government towards them in terms of the payment of such benefits?

Mr. Scott: I will ensure that the usual information on the workings of the national insurance fund and the contributions paid by employees and employers is made available. When we return to the House after the Christmas recess, there will be an opportunity for the House, provided that we complete proceedings on the Bill today, as we must, to consider the regulations that will cover the detail of the Bill. That would be an appropriate time for us to consider the advice that we will give to employers and employees for the arrangements that will exist in the new financial year.

The detail of the Bill deals with a single substantive measure—the 1 per cent. increase in employees' national insurance contributions. I shall mention two subsidiary items later.

The proposed increase in contributions has been public for a considerable time, having been announced in the March Budget by the former Chancellor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont). Earlier this week, when the House discussed the Bill's timetable, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said that, since then, at least 15 days had been available for discussion of the proposal.

The increase in employees' national insurance contributions requires social security legislation separate from the Finance Bill, because it is not a taxation measure, but a national insurance fund income measure under the care and management of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The other detailed aspects of the annual contributions rerating, which my right hon. Friend announced on the day of the Budget, will be dealt with, as I said a few moments ago, in the usual regulations and the affirmative order at a later date. I can confirm—in response to a point raised yesterday—that that order will, as is statutorily provided for, be accompanied by the customary report of the Government Actuary.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Can the right hon. Gentleman clarify whether there will be an opportunity to discuss the uprating statement, as in the past? Do the new Budget procedures preclude the ability to have a proper debate in the House on the details of the uprating statement?

Mr. Scott: There was ample opportunity for hon. Members to respond when my right hon. Friend made the uprating statement. As we have moved to a unified Budget, immediately followed by an uprating statement and then by legislation giving effect, where necessary, to any of the announcements, including the uprating statement, I do not believe that there is any shortage of opportunity in the House to discuss the impact of measures.

I am aware that, during the debate on the timetable of the Bill, hon. Members wondered whether the general arrangements of the House needed to be looked at in the light of the arrangements for the unified Budget. That is not a matter for me to settle, but I know that those who are responsible for the business of the House are giving some thought to it. That is the greatest comfort that I can give the hon. Gentleman at the moment.

I should emphasise that the increase applies only to the main rate of contributions—earnings over £57 a week—and does not apply to the lower rate of contributions; so lower-paid workers will pay proportionately less at the new, higher rate and the greatest increases will be for those on higher levels of pay at or near the upper limit. The increase across the range of earnings, on which the state-earnings related pension scheme accrues, maintains the contributory principle of the scheme as a whole. The 1 per cent. increase will assist the national insurance fund to the tune of £1·9 billion in the first year.

We are aiming—subject, of course, to parliamentary progress—to achieve Royal Assent by the end of January or early February, to allow time for details in the separate re-rating order to follow on and to ensure that employers can plan on the revised rates being firm when they receive the new contribution rates, which will be mailed out in February.

I shall touch on two subsidiary measures in the Bill. Last night, there was, if I may use the vernacular term, a bit of a son and dance about the national health service provisions in the measures that we are considering. It was built up, no doubt for reasons best known to those in charge of the response to business on the Opposition Benches, with a good performance by the Labour Members who sit below the Gangway. The provision is a minor corrective measure, and I am sure that when it is explained it will be supported on both sides of the House.

We currently allocate about 10 per cent. of all contribution income to the health service under a principle dating back to the inception of the contributory scheme as we know it. However, we have uncovered a minor ambiguity in the legislation that split employees' contributions in 1989 into an initial rate of 2 per cent. and a main rate of 9 per cent. which, as the House will be aware, is to be increased to 10 per cent. I am entirely clear that it was always intended that the NHS allocation should, from 1989 onwards, be paid out of the main rate and not out of the lower 2 per cent. rate, because that would have left only about half the 2 per cent. contribution rate to go into the national insurance fund.

As drafted, the legislation certainly excludes calculating the allocation on the 2 per cent. rate and it could be interpreted as excluding an allocation to the NHS on variants of the main 9 per cent. rate—for example, where employees are contracted out of SERPS and a rebated main contribution rate is paid. That was never the intention and the allocation has been paid all along to the NHS from all contributions from employees above the initial 2 per cent. rate. That simple addition to the Bill is a small amendment to ensure that legislation and time-honoured policy and practice properly coincide.

The third provision of the Bill is a simple clarifying amendment, which involves no change in policy. It will not change in any way the assessment for class 4 contributions and no one will be any worse off. It aims to put beyond doubt the existing policy that payments made to approved personal pension schemes by the self-employed are not allowable as relief in the computation of profits on which class 4 contributions are charged. It is in line with the basic principle that only genuine business expenses, not personal expenses, are allowed.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear on a number of occasions that the Government are committed to the welfare state, but to one which will not outstrip the nation's ability to pay for it in the longer term. However, I believe that the levels of expenditure to which we are committed for the immediate future require a readjustment of the balance of expenditure met by the taxpayer and the contributor. The increase in contributions is modest in terms of our past record, which is that we have twice reduced contributions and saved most people about £3 a week. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I thank the Minister for his courteous explanation of the Bill. I must confess that he reminded me that he is not a man given to raising the temperature. I suspect that that is why he has been put up to speak on this occasion. I especially appreciate the way in which he referred with slight distaste to the uncovering of a minor ambiguity—as if he were the proprietor of a bungalow and had found a worm on his lawn. I assure him that I do not intend to pursue that matter and follow the ingenuity of my colleagues that night.

I am more interested in what the Minister presented as an almost technical adjustment—in the increase in the basic national insurance contributions for employees. It is a short and simple Bill, which is to some extent brutal. Undoubtedly, it will be unpopular and will have unpleasant consequences. It is full of somewhat sinister possibilities for future policy.

I am genuinely a little surprised that the Secretary of State has decided to sit this debate out, although I understand that he is here and available to comment. However, I regard the Bill as an important measure; it is part of the central budgetary strategy of the Government and will raise a great deal of money. I do not want to make a war dance, but it is remarkable that the Secretary of State does not wish to explain the measure to the House himself and put it in the wider context—the Secretary of State is a great man for his wider context.

The Government strategy is built on taxes, which have increased over recent times, are increasing and, if the Chancellor has his way, will go on increasing dramatically. I would never criticise the Chancellor's commitment to the policy that he has chosen—to set about raising taxes with vim, vigour and a fair degree of imagination. We know from his evidence about which there has been a good deal of talk already, that the Chancellor told the Treasury Select Committee yesterday that there was no dispute and that it was common ground that what would be raised in the coming financial year would be the equivalent of 7p on the standard rate of income tax.

[Mr. Donald Dewar]

That is a pretty staggering figure for Conservative Members of Parliament—especially for those who have unusually long memories and can remember what they said during the general election campaign. The fact that the Chancellor has confirmed that his proposals will add the equivalent of £9 or £10 to the bills of an average family and that in the following year that £9 or £10 will escalate to £16 is, to put it charitably, food for thought among Conservative Members of Parliament and voters.

We are considering £24 billion over three years—a massive hike in taxation and one of the greatest in modern times. In the grand design, which was hidden with remarkable tenacity during debates on the general election, the Social Security (Contributions) Bill has a key and rather dishonourable role.

The Minister was careful to make a technical distinction about the adjustment in the contribution rate and he said that it was not a matter of taxation. I understand why he wants to clutch to that fig leaf—fig leaves were mentioned in the debate last night and I am glad to adopt that metaphor. It is a rise in taxation—a substantial rise—which affects the vast majority of the working population. I quote in evidence of the fact that it is taxation a speech made on 7 October 1993—to which I am sure the Minister listened —at the Conservative party conference by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. He said:

> "Most of Norman Lamont's tax increases will come from higher National Insurance Contributions, cuts in income tax allowances and a clampdown on tax avoidance".

We know that Ministers now rather belittle the idea of clamping down on tax loopholes and tax avoidance. The point I stress is that the Chancellor straightforwardly said that his predecessor's tax increases would come mainly from three areas, and the one area that led the list was higher national insurance contributions.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): The hon. Gentleman is obviously an expert on increasing taxation. Perhaps during his speech he will refer to Labour's policies and proposals for taxation and national insurance. Does Labour still have the policy of adding 10p to the top rate of tax, whatever that would be, and of removing the ceiling from those on the top level of national insurance? For many workers earning modest sums, the increase in income tax would be 20 per cent.

Mr. Dewar: I am always glad when the hon. Gentleman comes seeking the truth, although I am a little puzzled by his statement. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chancellor, has outlined a specific list of proposals on many occasions, usually with a certain air of embarrassment because he is greeted with shouts of "Boring!" from hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). It is not a case of the hon. Gentleman not knowing; it is a case of his not wanting to listen or to learn.

The Chancellor spoke at the conference about loopholes and about tax avoidance. A list of specific loopholes, including corporation tax loopholes, executive share options, advance corporation tax and scrip dividends, has been put on the table by my hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor. It would greatly improve the knowledge of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley—I have no doubt that he would enjoy the task—to read some of my hon. Friend's speeches.

There is a great deal of concern about the shadow Budget and about national insurance contributions—[Interruption.] I am glad that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) appears to be about to raise the matter. It fills two whole pages of the defensive briefing which was prepared for this debate by Conservative central office. The briefing contains a little calculation of the impact of Labour's proposals on an especially sensitive group of voters—those who earn just over £22,000. We were told that they would be especially victimised and that it was unthinkable that the shadow Chancellor could impose such a burden. We have the figure here. It is said that someone who earns £22,000 would have to pay £2·98 more a week under Labour's proposals. That is terrible, unthinkable and cause for outrage.

I do not know whether, in his deep researches into the matter, the hon. Member for Langbaurgh has taken the trouble to look at the briefing on the Bill prepared by the Library. If he takes that trouble, he will see someone earning £430 a week will pay far higher national insurance contributions than those proposed by the Labour party before the general election. I am very puzzled. I took the Conservatives' outrage and concern about the impact of those proposals as wholly genuine.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not dispute the arithmetic of the House of Commons Library. The figure will not be £2·98, as suggested in the shadow Budget and as quoted by Conservative central office. People in the category I have mentioned will face an increase of £4·56 a week. As there was outrage at the proposition produced before the general election, I confidently look forward to seeing the hon. Gentleman in my Lobby tonight. He must now be experiencing the most appalling difficulties of conscience about how he can support an imposition on those people which is far larger than any previously proposed.

Although the Secretary of State for Social Security is technically in charge of the Bill, it is, of course, part of the central Budget strategy, with its proposal of the equivalent of 7p on the standard rate. It was interesting that the Chancellor told the Treasury Select Committee yesterday that although all that was true, he was not raising money by putting 7p on the standard rate of income tax because there were better ways in which to do it. He said:

> "I think it's been raised in a much more desirable fashion myself."

I suppose that if he did not think that, no one would think that, so we should be grateful for his remark.

In the cheerful and chattering Sun, which always has helpful information on these matters, we get further assistance. The article says:

> "Treasury experts"—

fancy that: The Sun has been talking to Treasury experts—

> "believe increased income tax discourages hard workers while VAT-style rises make people feel better off."

I confess that as I move round my constituency and talk to people who are worried about increases in VAT, about national insurance contributions and other indirect taxation rises, they express a wide variety of sometimes irritated opinion on the matter. I have not yet come across anyone who has said, "I feel better off as a result of these increases in taxation." If The Sun has that odd animal in captivity, Treasury expert or not, it would be helpful for that person to be produced for inspection and analysis.

The Chancellor is reported in the Daily Mail as saying, when describing how he went for the better methods of raising the money:

> "I looked for those increases which would be most accepted and supported by the public."

We know now that the Chancellor had a pick-and-mix approach to the matter. What he picked and what he mixed were his proposals on mortgage interest relief at source, VAT on domestic fuel, holiday tax, car insurance tax and home insurance tax. He homologated—I accept that he was not the parent of this—the national insurance increase which had been put on the table by his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont).

No one in his right mind believes that the taxes will be popular. I believe that many Conservative Members hoped that they would not be noticed. They hoped that they could be smuggled through without any great public concern. That may be one reason why the Prime Minister used to say —the best known occasion was 28 January 1992—that the Government had no plans to raise the level of national insurance contributions. I confess that when I hear the Prime Minister or any of his senior Ministers saying that he has no plans, I run for cover. That is increasingly the public's attitude to these events.

The chairman of the Conservative party at the time of the election, when ruling out an increase in national insurance contributions, said—it was a nice phrase—that it would be a "stealth tax". "Stealth" is not a word that I associate easily with the knockabout style of the Chancellor. I do not regard him as a stealthy figure; he falls into the category of the cheerful spiv in his general approach to these matters.

The stealth factor was a military metaphor. We all know that the Conservative party is much given to military metaphors. The idea was that the Conservatives would smuggle in the increase at low level and undetected. My message to the Minister is that there is nae chance. The increase will be very much resented, and even when broken promises have been very much devalued by the frequency with which they have occurred, many people will see it as offensive.

I shall explain why, apart from broken promises, we believe that the Chancellor made an unfortunate choice when he decided to lay aside any direct taxation and to go for this form of indirect taxation. The Minister will know that the increase bites further down the income scale than income tax does. There are about 500,000 people who do not pay any form of income tax, but who pay national insurance contributions. Let us consider a shop assistant earning £6,000 a year. That person will pay another 38p a week—not a lot—as a result of the increase in national insurance contributions. If there had been an increase in direct taxation, that person, probably although not necessarily a lady, would have paid nothing because she would have been above the tax threshold.

I made the point about a different situation, where the increase will hit hard those earning just above £22,000, £23,000 or £24,000. I understand from my Conservative aquaintances that they are archetypal election fodder for the Conservative party. That is a strong contender for the most shameless broken promise of this Parliament, but I accept that some of my hon. Friends may disagree, because it is such a formidable field. The one thing on which we can all agree is that this is part of a Budget and it illustrates the principle that we are being asked to pay more and get less.

I have read Conservative material that suggested that national insurance contributions should go up. I pay tribute to the Minister, who did not try to argue that, although it has been argued by some of his colleagues, who say that it should go up because of the increase in benefits. In a sense that is true. Benefit costs have risen because we are funding unemployment and the recovery that has never come. It was a recovery that so excited the Chief Secretary at the time of the election that he failed to notice that we were heading for a £50 billion public sector borrowing requirement, as he rather disingenuously explained in a recent debate.

We must look at the balancing account—what people will get in return for the increase in national insurance contributions. It is particularly relevant, because if—it is a bit of an "if"—the Minister is right that it is not just general taxation, it would not be unreasonable to assume that there would be some sort of balancing improvement in benefit provision. The tragedy is that, over the years, many of the entitlements that arise from national insurance contributions have deteriorated.

Dr. Godman: Surely it is not just a question of deterioration in those benefits. There is a serious case, is there not? The Department is refusing to honour obligations to persons who have legitimate claims for contributory pensions. The Minister is still refusing to accede to a decision taken by a commissioner 18 months ago that women aged between 60 and 65 should be paid invalidity benefit. The Department is still refusing to honour that decision, which was taken in April 1992. Surely that is dishonourable.

Mr. Dewar: I admire—I use the word in no loose sense —the tenacity with which my hon. Friend has pursued that matter. He was temporarily out of the Chamber yesterday when the shadow of Mrs. Rose Graham fell across our proceedings. I agree that the way in which these matters get bogged down in litigation is alarming. As I understand it, there is now a suggestion that the Court of Appeal should remit the case to the European courts. We do not know when we will get a specific result.

Dr. Godman: I am sorry that I was absent yesterday when Mrs. Rose Graham was mentioned. In the case of a constituent of mine, I have made a formal complaint to the parliamentary ombudsman, accusing Ministers and their officials of maladministration in the matter.

Mr. Dewar: I know that my hon. Friend is knocking tirelessly on every door, and I endorse——

Dr. Godman: It is the Court of Session next.

Mr. Dewar: My hon. Friend and I look forward with interest to the unfolding drama.

I endorse my hon. Friend's general point. There are problems about obligations and worries about the way in which they are being eroded and disregarded.

I shall now use as an example the right to unemployment benefit, which is directly linked to national insurance contributions. It is interesting. In 1980—there will be people here with more detailed knowledge than myself—the abatement of unemployment benefit against occupational pension income was introduced. In 1989, that abatement was applied at the age of 55 rather than at 60. In 1984, the child dependency additions were abolished. In 1992, the earnings-related supplement was abolished. During those years, benefits were taxed.

A raft of new regulations—I do not think that anyone would quarrel with me about the matter—was specifically designed to disqualify and obstruct those trying to claim the benefit. The Government have a history of removing entitlements, weakening their obligations under the contract that is implicit in the national insurance scheme and trying to ensure that people did not draw unemployment benefit as they once would have done.

In his famous Mais lecture—famous because it is now read by many of my colleagues—the Secretary of State argued that one of the reasons for success in job creation in the United States—I hope that I do not misinterpret or misrepresent him—was that people had far less generous unemployment cover there. Presumably one might say that that physically and metaphorically cracked the whip behind the unemployed and persuaded them back to work. The implication clearly spelt out by the Secretary of State was that, if we could further weaken unemployment cover, we might get the same reaction.

It should not come as a surprise that, when we look at that long list of weakening of the unemployment benefit system, we now see a further move in that direction with the jobseeker's allowance. I find it illogical, ironical and slightly offensive, in view of the Government's record, that one of the reasons given for the job seeker's allowance is that so many unemployed people—I think that 70 per cent. was mentioned—are not getting unemployment benefit that it might as well be virtually abolished.

Of course a large number of people are not getting unemployment benefit when they are not working. In large part, that is because of the rule changes for which the Ministers who advance that argument have been responsible. It is a piece of sophistry to conduct the argument on that basis.

Whoever winds up the debate may wish to deal with this —perhaps the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), who seems to be the winder-up-in-chief. The job seeker's allowance is a cutting of an automatic entitlement in one's own right, on the basis of the contributions paid, to support when unemployed for between six and 12 months. My understanding from a written answer that came through the House a few weeks ago, is that if that was applied to unemployment benefit now, 240,000 people would no longer be entitled. That seems to be a real example of the "pay more, get less" theme, which is a mark of the Administration, the Bill and the Budget.

When the Minister winds up, I would like him to say a word or two about that. We know that the Chancellor said that the whole point of the job seeker's allowance was to align rates and rules between income support and the job seeker's allowance when it came to replace unemployment benefit. Another point that was made, and I understand it, was that one is a contributory benefit and the other is non-contributory.

Therefore, the contributory benefit would be uprated on the retail prices index, and the other on the Rossi index. If we are to have harmonisation on that point, it would be useful to know at this stage, as we prepare for the debates later, whether the new job seeker's allowance will be uprated on Rossi or on the RPI. It is a little like the problem that Members have when their constituency is halved by the Boundary Commissioners. Which way will they go? When it comes to the uprating, which way will the Secretary of State go?

I shall ask the Minister two specific questions. There will be wide interest in the response. I have heard—the Minister will be listening to me on this—rumours that, under the cover of introducing the job seeker's allowance, additional payments for adult dependants will be abolished. As the Minister knows, that is a feature of the contributory rights built up at the moment and honoured in the unemployment benefit scheme. Can he offer reassurance—or, if it is wrong, can he deny it—that the additional payments for adult dependants, at £27·55 a week at present, are not going to disappear and be quietly dropped overboard, thus representing a significant cut in benefit under the repackaging that the job seeker's allowance represents?

I am anxious, because I missed it—I make no apology for that—about something that the Secretary of State said in his uprating statement. He spoke of a personal rate in the first six months of the job seeker's allowance—the period of benefit as of right. I am beginning to suspect that the word "personal" was carefully chosen and that may give support to those who fear that the additional payment for adult dependants will go.

Secondly, when we align the rates and the structures, what will happen to those aged between 18 and 24? They are dealt with in a different way under income support than they are under unemployment benefit. Under the latter, there is a flat rate throughout the age range. There is no difference between the young person who is unemployed and the older one. However, under income support there is a smaller payment for those under 25. In April 1994, someone who is 24 and on unemployment benefit will get £44·45 a week, but someone who is 24 and on income support will get £36·15—a substantial difference of £9·30.

I fear that talk about aligning the rates means that people who have built up a right and an entitlement to the new job seeker's allowance will get a lower rate because they are under 25, as they would have done under income support, and will therefore be discriminated against and victimised. That is a specific question which the Minister should be able to answer easily. I shall press him to answer it when he replies.

I fear that there will be another substantial reduction in entitlement at the same time as the Government are raising contributions. It will again be pay more and get less, again robbing Peter, or almost anybody else, to pay Kenneth. The House should not nod through a Bill that does that, while assuming that there are no concerns.

I know that it is always irritating—I have always found it irritating when it happens to me—to have something one has said quoted at one. The Minister will remember that, in the social security debate earlier in the year, he said:

> "I do not think that my right hon. Friend has been sufficiently congratulated on the successful outcome that he has achieved—a very full uprating of benefit across the board, and no increase in national insurance contributions. I consider that a remarkable achievement."—[Official Report, 10 February 1993; Vol. 218, c. 1082.]

He cannot say that now. I hope—perhaps I give him credit to which he is not due—that he will continue to fight the good fight against the Secretary of State and the Treasury, trying to preserve a decent level of return for entitlement built up through the payment of contributions.

I must draw to a conclusion, but many points need still to be explored.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Before my hon. Friend moves on, will he confirm that the 200,000 people whom he said would lose as a result of the change in unemployment benfit and the reduction in entitlement as a result of the six months' change, will also disappear into a black hole in the unemployment statistics?

Mr. Dewar: My hon. Friend is right. I shall probably have little difficulty in persuading her that that is not an accident. It is not just a chance. I am sure that that factor occurred to Ministers as a useful by-product of the whole exercise.

Mr. Michael Bates (Langbaurgh): The hon. Gentleman has asked some specific questions. I have one for him to answer. If there were to be a future Labour Government, would they restore unemployment benefit to a universal nature and over 12 months?

Mr. Dewar: We shall have to wait and see what is proposed. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] We shall also have to see what our inheritance is. One of the features of the Government is that, every time someone invites us to put right a particular outrage, we discover that there are another six growing alongside it, and it becomes difficult to give pledges.

Let me make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that, unlike Ministers, we are concerned about preserving the proper balance between those who are in difficulty, through unemployment, sickness or disability, and those who are not. We are concerned about the way in which the balance is being tilted, with entitlements being weakened. That will be the basis from which we shall approach the problems.

I know that the hon. Gentleman takes an interest in those matters and I am sure that we shall have his support when the time comes. I do not know enough about his majority to know whether he will be here on the Opposition Benches to support us in Parliament, but I feel confident that, even in the community, he will be explaining the difficulties that we shall have to face and justifying our actions.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Gentleman came into my life for the first time yesterday. He was hyperactive. We had several speeches and a petition from him. I had a letter about him from the Secretary of State at lunchtime. I do not want to encourage him overmuch, but I gather—he tells me so—that he is the bearer of good news about the social fund. I hope that that will prove to be not a minor cosmetic change, but something substantial, dealing with the problems of the social fund.

When I spoke in the Budget debate, I drew attention to what seemed like difficult times in the Treasury. There is always a changing scene and at one point it seemed as though the Chancellor had cracked the whip and exercised his authority. I do not intend to go through it in great detail, but he gave an on-the-record briefing, much reported in the press, in which he made it clear that the back-to-basics move was nonsense, because any attempt to use the social security system to engineer social change, or to restrict or shape it, was not a practical proposition. He went on to make some trenchant comments about those misguided enough to suggest that the middle-income group should be invited to contract out of the basic state pension.

The Secretary of State took his cue—I congratulate him on that—and spoke about it in a "Walden" interview which I particularly enjoyed. I am afraid that I missed it visually, but I read the transcript afterwards. The Secretary of State made it clear that only over his dead body would anybody be contracted out of the basic state pension. As I said the other day, he is now the "never, not ever, man". We should be grateful for that.

I do not want to rehearse all that and perhaps intrude upon private grief, but I am interested—they are relevant to the debate—in certain events since then. Although the Secretary of State for Social Security has fallen into line with the Chancellor, rather interestingly it turns out that the Chief Secretary is made of sterner stuff and has not caved in. In a key part of his briefing, the Chancellor said:

> "I do not see that"— the basic state pension—

> "as being opted out or left as a vestigal remnant for those who cannot provide for themselves."

Only a few days later, as hon. Members will know, the Chief Secretary appeared on "Westminster Live" and said:

> "My worry about the state pension"—

> "is that it is going to be worth a nugatory amount in the coming century."

I am not suggesting that pensioners all over the country, as they gather around the yuletide log and over Christmas dinner, are anxiously discussing whether a pension can be "nugatory" without being "vestigial", but that is a matter of considerable importance. My fear is that the resistance that may still exist in the Department of Social Security, and that is clearly alive and all too well in the Treasury, may win the day.

What may happen is that the Chancellor will merely deny what is happening, but national insurance contributions will increase in the way that we are invited to authorise in the Bill. As I have illustrated fairly on unemployment benefit, there will also be a substantial rundown continuum in the worth of the basic state pension as against average earnings, so that it becomes, in that pretentious but significant word, "nugatory" by the time that we reach the next century.

When I was young, the next century seemed aeons of time away. It is now less than a decade away. Perhaps I shall even live to see it and to have that nugatory pension. Therefore, I take a personal interest in the matter. I shall watch for increasing public signs of how the debate progresses. Its significance is that it is again a clear sign of a danger of the wrong balance–tilting against entitlements, which many people imagined that they were building up as they made their contributions. It is further evidence of pay more, get less.

Mr. Heald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dewar: As I am coming to what I think the Secretary of State rather hopefully calls his "peroration" in his printed speeches, I shall allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene.

Mr. Heald: How would the hon. Gentleman make up the deficit in the national insurance fund?

Mr. Dewar: That is a good and interesting question. The hon. Gentleman will remember that, some time in the late 1980s, it was not the present Secretary of State for Social Security but some other optimist who announced that the national insurance fund was balanced and removed the statutory opportunity of making up a deficit. In 1992, the Government found themselves 20 per cent. short of the sum that they needed to meet their current obligations and had to come to the House.

We were helpful. We did not make much of it. We passed a Bill in one day because we were anxious to repair the damage and get them out of that particular embarrassment—not their embarrassment, which did not matter to me, but the embarrassment of not being able to pay people's benefits. As a result, there will be a shortage of up to 20 per cent.—it is likely to settle at about 17 per cent. Perhaps the Minister could say a word about how the figure may be influenced. Now, there is room for a Treasury subvention. That will have to happen, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would expect it.

It might be helpful if we had a Government with ambitions to see a growth rate rather above the 1·6 to 1·7 per cent. annual rate of the past decade, which has left us struggling behind many other European countries. As the Social Security Advisory Committee said in a report published yesterday, which I am sure the hon. Gentleman will have taken the trouble to read, much of the Government's talk about the inability to fund the present level of social security is unjustified and can be maintained only if one takes an extremely gloomy view of our economic prospects. That is a useful corrective and is perhaps also part of the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): My hon. Friend may recall that the Treasury supplement was 18 per cent. in 1979 and continued at that level for many years. In the late 1980s, the Government decided that they would not pay it, because the national insurance fund was so high. Does my hon. Friend agree that the situation today is the reverse of the days when David Lloyd George said that the national insurance scheme would involve paying in fourpence to get out ninepence? Now, we pay in ninepence and get out fourpence.

Mr. Dewar: That neatly puts the argument. [Interruption.] Let me make a sympathetic suggestion to the Minister. To be fair, the problems of the national insurance fund are partly due to economic failure, which has reduced income from national insurance contributions.

I have taken up sufficient time. The Minister of State is an extremely well-intentioned man. He has never been accused of reaching for the glittering prizes. Whether he did or not, I know not, but he certainly did not grasp them. He has had an honourable career in Northern Ireland and at the Department of Social Security. It is rather sad to find him now reduced to the role of a tax collector and general demolisher of entitlements that flow from contributory benefits.

I recognise the Government's difficulty—I would be silly if I did not. If one needs to borrow £1 billion a week merely to balance the books, clearly that cannot be entirely shrugged off. I suspect that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were in private industry, he would go bust in a big way—with style. That is my worry. I only hope that he does not take quite the same risks in future years.

The PSBR suggests that we have had some profligacy and certainly some incompetence. The one certainty is that people will have to pay dearly: £10 in the coming year or £9—I will not split hairs over that—and £16 the following year. That is an extraordinary contrast to the promises, pledges and, indeed, boasts of early 1992 when right hon. and hon. Gentlemen were on the hustings. Theirs has been a crashing fall. The trouble with politics is that once the election is over, one can lose all dignity and all claim to respect, yet survive. That is one of the ironies of British politics. The worse the Government and the more bedraggled their record, the less likely they are to be forced to go to the country. As unemployment stares Back Benchers in the face, they tend to rally to the colours.

I must content myself by saying that the measure is misconceived. It represents part of a trend to undermine the understanding, and some would say the contract, between Government and the governed which guarantees help in times of need—adequate help, as of right. The Government are embarked on a destructive course and there will be great anxiety and anger in the years ahead.

The Bill is dishonourable, not because it raises revenue —all Governments have to raise revenue and it would be silly to argue against that—but because it is part of a dishonourable package. The Government are asking people to pay more at a time when they are stripping down and undermining what people get in return. We will have none of it—and we will vote accordingly tonight.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has had a lot of fun with Conservative party documents stolen from the Conservative research department. He has had fun, too, talking about the Government's taxation record.

The hon. Gentleman was selective in his quotes from the document. For example, he did not mention that, according to page 10, in the past three months alone the Labour party has suggested a tourism tax, a pollution tax, a payroll tax, a health tax, a road pricing tax and, heaven forbid—I cannot believe this, having heard the hon. Gentleman's talk—even an entertainment tax, as well as an education tax and a windfall tax. Yet he dares to suggest that we are the party of taxation.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. Fabricant: I am delighted to give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dewar: I must confess that I read that page with great interest and some amusement. To say that those allegations are on thin ground and have poor foundations would be an understatement. Even if the hon. Gentleman takes them at face value, does he find them entirely ludicrous when he is about to go into the Lobby in favour of a car insurance tax, a home insurance tax, a travel tax, VAT on domestic fuel and an increase in national insurance contributions? Over the next three years we are to see the biggest tax increase that we have ever seen in the history of this country.

Mr. Fabricant rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman continues, I remind the House that we are considering a narrow Bill on Second Reading and that these exchanges could properly have taken place during the Budget proceedings.

Mr. Fabricant: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for your advice. Obviously, I would have given a devastating reply.

To return to the narrow subject of social security contributions, hon. Members will be aware that the main provision of the Bill is contained in clause 1. Its effect is to increase the rate by 1 per cent., from 9 per cent. to 10 per cent., for national insurance contributions paid by employees on earnings between the lower and the upper earnings limits. The Bill also clarifies existing national insurance contribution policy in two important areas. The first concerns how part of the national insurance fund is allocated to health service funds and the second reaffirms that self-employed people have to pay class 4 national insurance contributions on payments to personal pensions, an important element which has not been taken up so far.

There are two other important measures that do not require primary legislation: first, an increase in contributions for self-employed people on their class 4 contributions and, secondly, reductions in contributions payed by employers. The overall effect of the legislation is to simplify the administration of the fund and to make significant changes to the way in which it operates.

The most contentious aspect of the Bill is the increase in national insurance contributions, and I shall deal with that first as it has clearly not been addressed by Opposition Members. The Government, like those in all other western countries, where the old live longer and all are provided with state health care, face a huge and ever-increasing bill for social security expenditure. It now tops £70 billion. The trends behind that increase have continued unabated for decades and I think that that is accepted by hon. Members on both sides of the House. There has been an enormous increase in the costs of health care. The growth in the number of single parents and the increase in the number of working women, who rightly expect a pension on retirement, have also contributed to the huge and ever-increasing bill.

We are concerned today with trends in expenditure on contributory benefits alone, and here the story is much the same. Expenditure on those benefits rose by almost £10 billion in the four years to 1992-93 and it is expected to rise further still. Even as the world faces a wintry economic climate, and Germany and Japan continue their nose dive into recession, the Government——

Mr. Flynn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fabricant: I am delighted to give way to my honourable sparring partner.

Mr. Flynn: The hon. Gentleman, who is clearly, from his authoritative words tonight, an expert on social security, talked about the increased expenditure on national insurance. Will he give us the percentage figure by which employees' national insurance contributions have increased since 1979?

Mr. Fabricant: Anyone know? [Interruption.] My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State says 53 per cent.

As Germany and Japan have continued their nose-dive into recession, the Government have not flinched from their commitment to the needy and most vulnerable members of society. Retirement pensions alone rose by £2·5 billion during the past four years, and now social security benefits have been uprated across the board. Our social security budget will rise by some £11 billion during the next couple of years, which I know will interest the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn). This is a Government who recognise their responsibilities and, unlike the Opposition—whose talk is cheap—we will deliver.

Moreover, in 1985 and 1989, Government reform of national insurance saved the vast majority of employees about £3 a week. At the previous election, Labour proposed that the upper earnings limit on national insurance contributions should be abolished. What a disincentive to work. What a disincentive to the most able in our society. That measure would have increased by 9 per cent. the tax paid by everyone earning more than about £20,000. Before Opposition Members laugh, may I say that £20,000 is not that much more than the average working wage now.

With more people than ever before claiming pensions, invalidity benefit and unemployment benefit, the national insurance fund has moved from surplus to deficit. Expenditure is outstripping income. The principle behind the scheme is that of pay-as-you-go, with this year's expenditure being funded by this year's taxes. The insurance contribution of today is not for the pension of tomorrow.

The Treasury grant that was introduced this year was a sensible measure in these difficult economic times when stimulating the economy has been of overriding importance, but it can be only an interim measure. The Treasury grant is payed for by the general body of taxpayers. Some of those, such as pensioners, have already made a full contribution towards the national insurance fund. With expenditure rising and the national insurance fund running into deficit, the fund must be topped up by increased contributions.

At this juncture, I want to give a warm welcome to a Government omission. The Government have resisted any temptation to increase national insurance contributions by employers. That makes sound sense. Alone among those in Europe, our economy is recovering, but the recovery is fragile and any measures that would hit employers could jeopardise the rebirth of our nation's wealth.

Mr. Dewar: What about statutory sick pay?

Mr. Fabricant: I shall come to the subject of statutory sick pay shortly.

Our employers could ill afford the extra costs that raised national insurance contributions would represent. Our wealth creators have been, and must be, protected to such an extent that a reduction in employers' contributions has recently been announced. The standard rate of contribution is to fall from 10·4 to 10·2 per cent. Equally significant is the reduced rate for employers of lower-paid workers—a reduction of 1 per cent.

I acknowledge that, as the hon. Member for Garscadden said, employers will have to bear the extra costs of funding statutory sick pay, but those costs have been more than offset by the cut in employers' national insurance contributions.

It is my experience that businesses that provide a pleasant working environment suffer less from employee absenteeism, whether the sickness if genuine or feigned. Putting the responsibility for sick pay back on to the shoulders of employers will give them a major incentive to motivate the loyalty of their work forces. Opposition Members should welcome a move that would improve workers' health and well-being. Moreover, putting the burden of sick pay on employers will significantly save time on the Department of Social Security paper-shuffling that company wages clerks have to endure. That too will be an economic saving to employers.

The Government's approach to the national insurance fund and their way of dealing with the deficit is practical, imaginative and realistic. The Government are clearly aware of the need to create a strong and lively economy in order to finance welfare provision. In reducing employers' contributions recently, and employees' contributions a few years ago, they have realised the importance of keeping taxes as low as possible and are doing everything within their power to protect the motivation and enterprise of the work force.

One of the most attractive features in the approach to tackling the national insurance deficit is the care with which our lowest-paid have been treated. Even after the increase in contributions set out in the Bill, employees who earn less than £130 a week will still pay less national insurance than they did under the Labour Government in 1979. That is an impressive statistic.

The lowest-paid employees will be affected least of all by the rise in contributions. Those under the lower earnings limit will continue to make no contribution to the national insurance fund and, above that limit, those who are paid less will make a smaller contribution to funding the increase, as the hon. Member for Garscadden knows, having read the Conservative research department brief.

An employee earning £60 a week will pay just 3p a week extra, while someone earning £200 a week will have to pay £1·43 a week extra. There is a maximum of £4·56 a week. Labour would have abolished that ceiling.

The lower-paid have always contributed less to the national insurance scheme. That is right and proper. It is admirable that the Government have accentuated that feature of the system. The changes to the national insurance scheme introduced in 1985 and 1989 provided that result. The reduced rate of contributions, which was enacted in 1985, means that the lower the pay, the greater the proportion of earnings that is assessed at the lower rate.

The Government's emphasis on the needy has been demonstrated by the extra help with fuel costs being made available to pensioners. I expected Opposition Members to intervene at this point but, as none is doing so, I shall point out that although the Opposition talk about small sums being given, £120 billion is being made available to just 15 million needy and pensioners. Clearly, that figure has got through to Opposition Members——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There is about to be an intervention from the Chair. How do the hon. Gentleman's comments relate to the Second Reading of the Bill under consideration?

Mr. Fabricant: I bring to the attention of the House the Government's general policy on social security and care of the needy, but I shall endeavour to confine my remarks to the more narrow subject.

Mr. Heald: Does my hon. Friend agree that one possible relevant point is that pensions are paid from the national insurance fund and they are being uprated to help pensioners and the needy? Does he recall the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) saying, before the Budget, that 50p compensation per pensioner would be more than adequate? The hon. Gentleman changed his tune after the Budget. Perhaps he would like to intervene on that subject.

Mr. Fabricant: I await a further intervention, but I see that there is none forthcoming.

The Government have given much encouragement to people taking out pension schemes funded by this contribution. Behind that lies the Government's aim to construct a welfare system that gives incentive to personal responsibility. It has been eminently successful, with some 15 million people—three quarters of those eligible—opting out of the state earnings-related pension scheme. Some 5 million people have private pensions, including 1·4 million self-employed people. I am pleased to note that the present arrangements, confirmed in the Bill, are working so well. They are appreciated by the self-employed, and I am glad that no attempt has been made to change them.

Mr. Bates: Before my hon. Friend leaves the subject of the state earnings-related pension scheme, and national insurance generally, may I ask whether he accepts that one of the principal advantages of private pensions is that the money put into them can be invested, thereby helping the economy to continue to grow?

Mr. Fabricant: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. As he says, money from pension funds has been used in ventures that have created employment for people who might otherwise be unemployed and have to draw from the very fund for which the Bill provides.

Mr. Flynn: Did the hon. Gentleman say that 15 million people have opted out of SERPS and into private personal pension schemes? I do not rise to query the figure, but I believe that it is massively inaccurate. Now that it is becoming apparent that at least 500,000 people who opted out of occupational pension schemes face poverty and old age and 1·5 million people who have opted out of SERPS also face disaster, there will be an enormous scandal because of the inherent waste of personal pension schemes. The money invested is gobbled up by huge commissions, administrative charges and profits for the company concerned. The national insurance scheme is efficient and cost-effective.

Mr. Fabricant: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his speech, which enabled me to have a breather. I confirm that 15 million people have opted out of SERPS and into various schemes. If he would like to check the figures, he can read them in the Conservative party brief which the hon. Member for Garscadden clutches and will no doubt use in his wind-up speech.

The measures in the Bill will naturally be viewed in the wider context of the recently announced changes to national insurance benefits, such as the replacement of unemployment benefit with the new job seeker's allowance and the replacement of invalidity and sickness benefits with incapacity benefit.

In "Social Insurance and Allied Services", Beveridge, the founding father of the welfare state, who acknowledged that state provision should be limited, wrote:

"The State in organising security should not stifle incentive, opportunity, responsibility; in establishing a national minimum for himself and his family."

Provision for the sick and elderly is absolutely necessary and a national minimum is, and always will be, provided.

Even the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) said, in The Guardian on 18 January 1993:

"It is the Labour Party that is seen as in favour of molly-coddling people. We have to be tough with ourselves and ask why that has happened. We have to convince people that we are not a tax and spend party."

Clearly, the Labour party continues to fail to get that message across.

Unconditional and long-enduring benefits for the unemployed are superficially attractive——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already warned the hon. Gentleman to relate his remarks to the Bill under consideration. The more general remarks that he is now making could have been made in previous debates in the House in the past fortnight or so.

Mr. Fabricant: The Government's policy has been very different from that of the Opposition and has yielded spectacular results. Britain is the only nation in Europe that is not sliding deeper into recession. The Labour party is wringing its hands with pity for the needy but, whenever it has been in power, it has been unable to deliver the goods.

The provisions that we are considering reflect the Government's emphasis on sound finance and an unwavering commitment to those in need. For that reason, I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): I wish to raise some fundamental questions about the future of national insurance, and shall not therefore follow the speech by the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant), although I am bound to say that I could just about tell where Beveridge ended and the hon. Gentleman carried on.

Despite the giggling on the Conservative Benches, we are dealing with some serious questions. I make a plea that, at some stage in the debate, the Minister should present us with a statement about the Government's view on the future of national insurance. Clearly, many different factors affect national insurance now, on both the contributions side and the benefits side. What is lacking from the Government is an overall statement about how they see the future of national insurance—if they see a future for it at all. It is difficult to understand that because we face, on the one hand, higher contributions—hence today's debate—and, on the other, lower benefits in real terms for many people who draw from the fund.

Mr. Bates: The point has been made several times that the amount spent on social security this year is about £74·5 billion. Over the next three years, it is due to rise to about £92 billion. That is not less out for more in.

Mr. Wicks: Obviously, we are spending more for a range of reasons, some good and some bad. Many people are living longer and are rightly drawing their pensions, although in real terms those pensions are far lower than they would have been if they had not been de-indexed from earnings in 1980. The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire, who described trends affecting social security expenditure over many decades, was having us on, historically speaking.

Unemployment has been the feature of the past decade and a half, coinciding with a particular political epoch. Since the war, wise Governments—both Conservative and Labour—have pursued policies of mass employment. There was lower social security expenditure because of that macro-economic policy. I do not concede, therefore, that high public spending on social security is necessarily an indicator of sound social policy. In part, it is a sign of bad economic policy.

Mr. Fabricant rose——

Mr. Wicks: Does the hon. Gentleman have more to say?

Mr. Fabricant: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He blames unemployment, yet Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands and Spain—once again, we are grateful to the Conservative party briefing for this information—are all having to introduce measures similar to the one that we are debating.

Mr. Wicks: I do not think that leadership in Britain means following bad practice abroad. As we did in the war and thereafter, we should renew our national determination to move back to full employment. As the hon. Gentleman will see, he is not the only one who can support Beveridge. I, too, have read the Beveridge report and I intend to quote from it.

I renew my plea to the Government to make a strong statement on their vision for the future of national insurance. If we agree today—we may not—to increase contributions by 1 per cent., we should know the context of that decision and the strategy behind it. I want to spend some time outlining the changes that have affected Britain in the post-war period—how the risks have changed and how new risks have materialised as a result of social and demographic change. We need to ask how those risks will be dealt with in future.

In a sense, the modern history of social insurance starts with William Beveridge. It has, of course, a much longer history in the voluntary and state sectors here and in other European countries such as Germany. But we start, conveniently, with Beveridge who, in many respects could be regarded as a dreamer of dreams, a reverist, a man who had a vision for the future.

Equally, in many important respects Beveridge was a superb technician. He was a planner. Many of his wartime speeches are well known and oft recited, even today, because they had more to say about the 1990s, perhaps, than about the 1940s—not least on unemployment. The man's planning and technical abilities were impressive.

One of the strengths of the Beveridge report lay not in the technical detail or the broad policy but in how Beveridge and his colleagues came up in the midst of a war with a view of society, demography and employment, and of the roles of men and women. Some of his assumptions, not least about the role of women, turned out to be wrong —a good thing, we might say. Still, he had a vision, and Parliament and the Government also need a vision when they set national insurance in the context of social and economic change.

What has changed since Beveridge? First and foremost, unemployment has changed. Beveridge assumed, in line with the Keynesian thinking of the time, that we could move towards full employment. He did not underestimate the difficulties, but that was his vision. In the simple, powerful language that he used in many wartime speeches, he spoke of the five giant evils that Britain needed to destroy if we were to construct a decent society for ourselves. He spoke of the evils of want, disease, ignorance, squalor and idleness. Many modern politicians would do well to copy Beveridge's language and adapt it. Too often these days, our debates get bogged down in detail and jargon. The landmarks are never clear.

William Beveridge had something important to say about the giant evil of idleness, by which he meant unemployment:

> "Idleness is the largest and the fiercest of the five giant evils and the most important to attack."

That is our text for the future of national insurance and for the 1990s. We are learning in many areas, not least those of crime and education, that unless our vision demands a move back to full employment we will always face difficulties with social security expenditure and with meeting needs that must be met through the social security system. If we lack that vision, we shall have to spend billions of pounds keeping people out of work. Macro-economic policy should make it its main business to put people back into work.

What is the Government's vision, or assumption, about full employment and unemployment? I am genuinely pleased that unemployment is falling. I see too many victims of it in my surgeries. Each time we hear of someone getting a job it is a victory for that person and that person's family, and for our community and economy——

Mr. Fabricant: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was reprimanded three times by Madam Deputy Speaker for not confining myself narrowly to the subject of the Bill. Has not the hon. Gentleman allowed himself to stray?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, if the hon. Member had deviated by even a quarter of an inch, I would have reprimanded him. I find his speech extremely interesting so far.

Mr. Wicks: And I write my own speeches, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Fabricant: So do I.

Mr. Wicks: Do not admit too much, my friend.

If we cannot grasp the relationship between national insurance and methods of ensuring ourselves against modern risks and against unemployment, we in this House will have a problem. I ask the Government in all sincerity why, if we can set targets and bands for inflation, we cannot set them for full employment, too. The Red Book seems to assume that there will be 2·75 million unemployed for the foreseeable future. Is that a technical assumption? Is it the Government's judgment? If it is the former, what does it mean? Will the Government tell us today what they think unemployment will be like in two years' time, or by the year 2000? My worry is that, welcome as the fall in unemployment is, it may not be enough. Do the Government believe that unemployment will fall to 2 million? What are their assumptions?

A Government's assumptions about these matters were vital to Beveridge's social insurance plan, just as they are vital to social insurance today.

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is extraordinarily difficult to make realistic calculations of unemployment? Many economists believed that unemployment probably would not start to fall until next spring, yet since February this year, each month, including this month, unemployment has consistently fallen. That highlights how difficult it would be to make a meaningful or realistic calculation of that sensitive economic indicator.

Mr. Wicks: The hon. Gentleman is right, of course, but it seems to me that we have a Parliament and a Government because things are difficult. The more fundamental point is whether the attack on idleness and the achievement of full employment is a real objective—not a wish, because we all wish it—of economic policy. Wise people in the past from all parties—Keynes, Beveridge, Attlee and Macmillan—felt that full employment was vital. Do the Government feel that it is vital? What policy tools do they have to achieve that in the coming months and years?

The second change which has affected the landscape of national insurance, and which is therefore crucial to consideration of the Bill, is in employment patterns. We have seen the rise of the two-worker family and a massive increase in female employment, which is so important to social security. Indeed, the increase in female employment is one of the most important social security factors in this country. Mothers are able to work, although not enough can find work. There would have been far more family poverty if it were not for the employment of mothers. That is more important than child benefit and family credit combined.

I will highlight another change which affects any national insurance scheme. Although we live longer nowadays, we are employed for a smaller proportion of our lives, because we enter the labour market later. Many working-class boys and girls will not get jobs when they are 16, some perhaps never, although I hope that most will. They may get jobs when they are 17, 18 or 19. Who knows when the children of middle-class, professional people—I have two children at university now—will get jobs? They may be in their early or mid-20s. That must have implications for the contributions and benefits that we are discussing today.

I should like to relate another interesting feature of the Government's proposal that women should be able to get pensions at the age of 65. We are leaving the labour market earlier. One of the great myths about society, social security and pensions is that men work until they are 65. Many do not, and the data show that the changes have been dramatic.

In 1951, in the first census after the war, 88 per cent. of men aged between 60 and 65—the pre-retirement group—were economically engaged or active. The Beveridge assumption that men worked from when they were boys until they retired at 65 was then more or less true. The 1991 figures for that age group showed that just 57 per cent. were economically active, to use the economists' unhelpful jargon. I say unhelpful because the "economically active", according to economists, include some of the unemployed. In practice, just 49 per cent. of men in that age group were employed in 1991, and the percentage may be less now.

Should we now build contributions and benefits for men and women based on their eventual entitlement at 65, when the trends are going the other way? Why have the Government hit on 65 suddenly when so many have retired for good reasons or ill, be it voluntary retirement or redundancy, long before that age? That is an important question which I should like put to the Government.

The third change affects the caring role of the family. Any national insurance scheme which relates to social security must have a grasp and a concept of the caring role of the family, which is its most important function. Today, families have fewer children. The average is about 2, or 1·8 per woman. However, children are dependent on their parents for longer than in the immediate post-war period. As has been said, gone are the days when most young people would leave school at 16 to get things called "jobs". Most do not do so now, for good, bad and ugly reasons.

How does the social security system deal with that? How does it deal with the emerging role of the family in caring for its elders and betters? The figures show that 6·3 million people are family carers who look after elderly parents or another relative. Given that many of those carers are women, some of whom, although not all, must leave employment, what are the implications for social security?

I know that the Government have some answers—for example, that national insurance contributions have been allowed for. However, any future strategy for national insurance must pay more attention to the role of people, many of whom are in their 50s or early 60s, who are carers or workers, or both. National insurance must reflect those trends. Were he alive today, William Beveridge would have looked at that issue when framing a social policy. We should do the same.

The fourth change is in the risks which people face in their lives, and the implications for national insurance and other parts of the social security system of family change and family breakdown. Looking again at the Beveridge report—as one does most evenings—one sees that Beveridge said little about one-parent families. He talked mainly about widowhood and the need to have a national insurance system to look after widows and the few widowers. The phenomenon of the large proportion of single unmarried mothers—probably 18 per cent. or almost one in five of our children live in one-parent families—is a key challenge for social security, as the Government recognise. What are the implications for national insurance? Are there any implications?

It is fascinating that Beveridge with his sexist view, as we would say now, of the role of men and of national insurance, nevertheless recognised that, when a marriage ended, a new risk of poverty was presented. He toyed with the idea in his report that perhaps a national insurance scheme should recognise the risks that many women faced when a marriage ended through no fault of their own, as he put it.

Beveridge could not frame detailed policies and, of course, the national insurance system, as opposed to other parts of social security, never recognised the risks of divorce. If the Beveridge questions about changes in family life and the risks that we face were asked today, a latter-day Beveridge would accept that almost four in 10 of recent marriages would end in divorce. More and more men and women, but particularly children, become victims of the social revolution and of family change. That revolution has not been bloodless. How are we to socially secure people? Is it through social insurance, or through other aspects of social security?

Mr. Burns: Has the hon. Gentleman read Philip Ziegler's biography of Harold Wilson, in which the author goes into great detail on putting together the Beveridge report and Harold Wilson's work on it? I suspect that the hon. Gentleman may not like the answer that Beveridge would have come up with to the question that he is posing.

Given that Beveridge was very much a figure of the 1940s, would he not find the situation in Britain in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s with regard to single-parent families somewhat incomprehensible?

Mr. Wicks: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making, but Beveridge understood rather more than the hon. Gentleman implies. In the report, he said that a housewife's loss of home maintenance without her consent and not through her fault was one of the risks of marriage against which she should be insured, and that she should not depend on assistance. However, that did not lead to legislation.

The hon. Gentleman suggests that Beveridge would be disturbed by some of the family changes which affect us. I am sure that he would be disturbed. We should be disturbed that seven out of 10 one-parent families depend on income support. Eighty-five per cent. of one-parent families depend on income support at some stage. I am disturbed about that, because it leads to massive public spending which, in a better world, we would spend elsewhere. It also means that too many of our children and our citizens live in desperate poverty. With Christmas coming, I do not relish that fact. It is a challenge to us all. We not not be so far apart on that one.

In addition to the social changes that I have outlined, there have been changes in social security benefits such as the rise of non-contributory, non-means-tested benefits which challenge the concept of national insurance.

I end by repeating my plea. We could have a relatively narrow debate today on whether the 1 per cent. increase is too much or too little. We could argue about the benefits to be cut. However, unless we place the measure in a wider context, as my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden has done, and unless we talk about the Government's vision and strategy for the future of national insurance when we face new risks in the light of social change, we shall not be able to debate and make the decisions on what many regard as a grey and boring area of public policy, but one that may have more impact on the life of our nation and the welfare of our people than even the GATT round.

We are discussing vital matters which affect millions of people, many of whom face enormous risks. I encourage the Minister to make a strong statement about the future of national insurance and its strategy today.

6.50 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am extremely grateful for the opportunity to speak in tonight's important debate. We have heard from hon. Members on both sides how important the welfare state is to Britain. It is the cornerstone for people who need benefits and require help from those who can afford to pay.

Mr. Flynn: The hon. Gentleman has illustrated a fundamental division between the two sides of the House. Beveridge wanted a system of national insurance in which people paid contributions and claimed them back as a right. The hon. Member refers to a poor law scheme under which people had payments as a charity.

Mr. Evans: Obviously I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. The measures are a safety net for those in need; however, other Government policies provide a trampoline for people who want to spring up and help themselves. They represent a self-help philosophy, as well as supporting those who cannot help themselves.

Mr. Bates: My hon. Friend has touched on a key point. Is it not the case that the Labour party Social Justice Commission was instructed to consider whether we ought to means-test all benefits? Is that not at odds with the Beveridge principle about which we have heard so much?

Mr. Evans: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I am not sure where the Labour party thinks it is going or whether it knows where it is going on social security. I asked the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) some questions and I did not receive sensible replies. When we ask what policies we could expect from the Labour party, we receive blank stares. One of my hon. Friends asked the hon. Member for Garscadden a specific question, but he was unable to respond.

The Government have increased massively the money being provided through the social security system. In 1979, it was just over £40 billion. We are now talking about £74·5 billion and rising, as the Government are absolutely certain to ensure that the increases will stay ahead of inflation to ensure that those on benefits will not suffer.

Mr. Heald: One of the criticisms by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the Leader of the Opposition, was that the Conservative party is committing a fraud on the nation by abandoning the contributory principle. Yet David Blunkett said recently:

> "The Inland Revenue and Benefits Agencies should be amalgamated"——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must do a little more homework and refer to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett).

Mr. Heald: I was carried away with the exuberance of my own verbosity, and I apologise.

The hon. Member for Brightside said that we should abandon the contributory principle in favour of automatic eligibility. What does my hon. Friend consider to be Labour party policy on this?

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend has put his finger on it. I am at a loss to establish what Labour party policy is. Labour Members are behaving like Liberal Democrats, in that they say one thing to one group of people and something else to another. Perhaps, before the end of the debate, the hon. Member for Garscadden, or another Labour Member, will explain to us in detail the Labour party policy on social security.

The social security system is the cornerstone of the welfare state, but the most important principle of the national insurance fund is that we pay out what we put into that fund.

One of the greatest commitments that the Government have made to national insurance and social security is to the elderly. We have heard all sorts of things this evening from the Labour party about why the Government are spending more money on social security. Under the Conservative Government, people are living longer than ever before. That is another great achievement of the Conservatives.

The 14 years of Conservative government have witnessed a real increase in expenditure on benefits to pensioners of 33 per cent. Labour Members talk sincerely about caring for elderly people, but during their last period of office the increase was about 3 per cent. That shows the difference between the words of the Labour party and the action of a Conservative Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) reminded me that, on two occasions when the Labour party was in government, it stopped the Christmas bonus. It is useful to remind ourselves of that.

An increasing problem with national insurance is that, because people are living longer, there are far more people of pensionable age. When people reach retirement, they are living longer in retirement, so the bill is forever increasing.

The deficit which characterises the national insurance fund is made up by the Treasury grant which was mentioned as £7·5 billion for the current year. That has to come from the hard-earned money of taxpayers, and we are talking about hard-pressed budgets. That money could be used in other Departments, or even to help relieve the stress on the budget deficit.

The contributory benefits are available to all who contribute, so if the levels of benefit are uprated, surely it is reasonable to ask that the rise be reflected by a comparable rise in the contributions.

Benefits have been rising dramatically, while national insurance contributions have been frozen as a percentage for more than a decade. The readjustment of the level of contribution is inevitable, and must be keenly anticipated by anyone who favours sound economic policy as a foundation for our country. If we are to maintain benefits at their current satisfactory rates, more funding must be found.

Mr. Flynn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evans: I was talking about sound economics, and I would be rather surprised if anyone on the Opposition Benches knew anything about that.

Mr. Flynn: I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman. It is clear that the Government are fielding people who are reading their briefs and have no knowledge of social security. It is a great shame that we have not heard from the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who does know something about it.

Has the hon. Gentleman read the report published yesterday by the Social Service Advisory Committee—the Government's own advisers? After looking at several models of what is likely to happen in future, it stated that only by using the most pessimistic assumption will the percentage of GDP spent on social security rise to the year 2000.

The hon. Member for Havant also said that the demographic time bomb has been vastly exaggerated. Instead of listening to Conservative Members speaking from prepared briefs that they barely understand, why can we not hear from those who understand social security?

Mr. Evans: I gave way in the hope that I would hear something useful from the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn). I should have known better. It is a shame that the hon. Member still comes out with that sort of slur.

We feel strongly about the system of social security payments. We are here to ensure that the amount of money paid out of the national insurance fund will be met from the contributions of those people who pay into it. It is only in the Walt Disney world of designer socialism, in which the hon. Member for Newport, West lives, that other people pick up the tab.

There will come a time when the hon. Member will understand that the bill will have to be paid. He talks about more money for this sector and more money for that sector, but somebody [illegible] to pick up the tab. The Government have that responsibility, and that is why we are here this evening.

Mrs. Jane Kennedy (Liverpool, Broadgreen): The hon. Member has spoken about the need to ensure that those contributing to the fund contribute enough to pay benefits. Why is it that the Government's proposals retain the ceiling on national insurance contributions, which throws the greatest burden on people on lower earnings?

Mr. Evans: I am grateful to my hon. Friend—to the hon. Lady. I almost said "my hon. Friend"—[HON. MEMBERS: "You did".] I would not like to put an end to her career within her party.

Are we getting closer to what the Opposition believe? Do they still have a policy to abolish the ceiling on upper earnings? That would mean, effectively, an increase in taxation for a lot of people earning more than £20,000 or £22,000 per annum. I was under the impression that the Labour party decided it would no longer go along with that policy. I will gladly give way to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mrs. Kennedy) if she will tell me what the Labour party's policy is in regard to the upper earnings limit, over and above a contribution of £430.

Mrs. Kennedy: It is a question of fairness and the importance of ensuring that people contribute fairly to the national insurance fund.

Mr. Evans: We will not get an answer to our question. The hon. Lady talks about fairness, but with these national insurance contributions, the Government have ensured that those on the lowest level of earnings pay nothing towards national insurance. People start to pay only above the £57 level. There is a £430 ceiling on national insurance contributions, and we are more than happy to stay with that.

A contributory factor in the Labour party's defeat at the last election is that its members paraded around the country and told people on modest incomes that they wished to put up their income tax by 10 per cent. and their national insurance contributions by 9 per cent. People would not tolerate that.

Mr. Bates: I may be able to help my hon. Friend about the information that he tried to get from Opposition Members. I asked the same question of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) during the debate on the Address. I asked him if he still stood by his policy of abolishing the upper earnings limit. His reply was:

> "Our policies are going before the Commission on Social Justice".—[Official Report, 25 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 597.]

Mr. Evans: That comes as no surprise to me. We will not get any answers to any of the questions that we ask the Labour party.

The Labour party was so embarrassed by the message that it paraded throughout the country during the last general election, that it decided to get rid of its shadow Chancellor and promote him to leader of the party. If that is what he said when he was shadow Chancellor, I cannot wait for the next election to find out what he will say as leader. He will get into all sorts of problems.

People on lower earnings will be protected. Only those earning more than £57 will pay national insurance contributions. Before Opposition Members uncharacteristically intervene yet again to say how hard done by people are because of the increase in national insurance contributions, they should know that, even with the increase, people earning approximately £130 a week will be paying lower national insurance contributions under the Government than they were under the last Labour Government, and will receive far more in benefits.

The Labour party's offerings on national insurance at the last election provided no surprises. If we ask people in the street what the Labour party means to them in taxation policies, we will be told that it stands for higher taxes.

The Labour party stands for economic stagnation and general colourless misery. It has no ideas about the economy, and that is one reason why Labour has been out of power for the past 14 years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not mind how wide the debate is on social security, but we really ought to be debating social security and not general taxation.

Mr. Evans: I was trying to demonstrate that the problem with the message that the Labour party is trying to sell—whether it is about taxation or national insurance —is that, if the ceiling on the top rate of national insurance were removed, the two might as well be merged and called a general taxation, which would simply be increased by 20 per cent. for people earning over those modest levels.

Dr. Godman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evans: Let me make a little more progress.

The hon. Member for Broadgreen talked about removing the ceiling on national insurance contributions. Once a Government went above a certain level, they would have the problem of disincentives, which would encourage a brain drain, or a fame drain. People who earned a certain amount of money would want to look at the opportunities before them, particularly within the single European market. During the 1970s, under the last Labour Government, people were leaving the country in droves because of the high rates of tax and national insurance.

Mr. Fabricant: My hon. Friend is far too young to recall this, but in 1979 the top rate of tax was about 98p in the pound.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have just ruled that general taxation matters are out of order.

Mr. Heald: The great rip-off in the Labour party's scheme to abolish the upper earnings limit was that it was prepared to agree that the people paying the highest contributions should get the highest earnings-related additions and long-term benefits. That was a complete abolition of the contributory principle. If it was not, there was no point in it.

Mr. Evans: I thank my hon. Friend for making that important point. It is clear that the contributory principle means nothing to the Labour party. It is interested only in grabbing as much money as possible from as many people as possible. It is not just the top earners who would be hit by increases in national insurance contributions: other earners would be hit by it or by other taxes.

As well as ensuring that as many people as possible contribute to the national insurance fund, we must ensure that those who ought to be contributing to it are doing so. A certain group of people tend to exploit loopholes in the system to avoid payment—whether of income tax or national insurance on eligible income. That includes the giving and receiving of non-pecuniary bonuses, in the full and certain knowledge that the purpose of such schemes is the avoidance of national insurance payments. That cannot be permitted; such loopholes must be blocked as much as possible.

We must deal with those who try to claim exotic goods as payment in kind instead of bonuses. Not only are such people avoiding national insurance payments; others who need the benefits are not receiving them.

In his Budget speech, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor spoke of ensuring that such loopholes are filled; it is estimated that, by filling them, the Government will reclaim £15 million per week. Nor do I believe that it stops there. I believe that the cheats and fraudsters have had their day. This unwelcome industry is not new, but it has become increasingly conspicuous as the level of abuse has risen.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made his position absolutely clear on both the loopholes and the fraud. If we can tackle both, there will be far more money for those in need.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman has spoken of abuses of the system. Does he support the decision of Social Security Ministers not to pay invalidity benefit to women aged between 60 and 65, many of whom are suffering severe hardship? That decision contravenes a decision by a European Commissioner, who has said that the Government are in breach of EC directive 79/7, dealing with equality of payment of pensions to men and women.

Mr. Evans: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will mention that in winding up.

Dr. Godman: What does the hon. Gentleman think?

Mr. Evans: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying; but given the kind of benefits that the Government are paying out, it is amazing that he should try to pick holes in certain cases. The Government are paying out a vast sum of taxpayers' and national insurance payers' money, and they are keen to ensure that it is targeted on those who desperately need it. I believe in that principle, and I am sure that the Government will continue to operate it.

Dr. Godman: What about all those women?

Mr. Evans: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is really interested in hearing what I have to say about cracking down on national insurance fraud. If not, perhaps I should proceed to my next point.

The Government have embarked on an anti-fraud strategy to ensure that the money in the national insurance system goes only to those who need and deserve it. That strategy is absolutely right.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): The exchange that we have just heard illustrates the width of definition that sometimes applies to loopholes and fraud. However, many of our constituents—including both small business men and employees—will understand full well what my hon. Friend means. As people who play by the rules and pay their tax and national insurance contributions, they are caused great anxiety by such activities.

Mr. Evans: I thank my hon. Friend for making that point. It does not really matter whether we are talking about business men and others with money who try to avoid paying their dues, or about those who defraud the system; the net outcome is that the money is not going into the system to be paid to those who need the benefits.

We need to take fraud seriously, and the Government are doing so. They want to ensure that money lost through fraud is recovered: their current target is over £1 billion. It is very ambitious, but I believe that they can achieve it. They are considering the introduction of identity cards, and have already introduced bar coding.

I believe that the Bill is all about ensuring that those who need benefits receive them, and that those who are able to pay are made to do so. That is why I support it.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak briefly in this important debate. If ever there was an argument against guillotine motions, it is provided by the requirement for Opposition Members to come in and make 25-minute speeches—all of them repeating the arguments of the last general election—during debate of a serious social security Bill. That has increased my distaste for the guillotine. I hope that the Minister will relay my view to the Government's business managers.

I believe that one of the most important principles enshrined in the contributory system set up by Beveridge is the principle of redistribution. What he was trying to achieve was not necessarily vertical redistribution, but redistribution throughout life: he sought to establish a system that would allow people to put away amounts to provide for untoward events such as sickness, invalidity, childbirth and old age during the economically active periods of their lives.

For the reasons stated so eloquently by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and amplified by the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks), I feel that the Bill takes a serious step towards eroding that important element in our present social security system. If the 1 per cent. that it introduces had been raised and redeployed to improve the organisation of the system of redistribution throughout the lifetime, I for one would have been very much in favour of it; but it does not.

As far as I can see, that 1 per cent. is an instrument of economic management, intended to deal with the public sector borrowing requirement. Of course I accept that there is a problem——

Mr. Fabricant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kirkwood: No. I want to allow as many other hon. Members as possible to speak, and I hope to make a short but relevant speech.

My objection to the Bill, then, is that it is intended to raise money for economic and financial purposes. The public sector borrowing requirement certainly needs to be addressed, but it should be addressed in other ways. It is disingenuous, to say the least, to start tinkering with the national insurance contributory system in this way.

The Bill contains some tidying-up provisions—I think that that is the best way in which I can paraphrase the Minister's introductory remarks—in the form of changes in the formula for the element that goes from the national insurance fund to the national health service.

In parenthesis, I object strongly to clause 2(3), which makes those changes—not because I object to an important and beneficial clarification of the position, but because it is retrospective. If we look at the provision in detail, we see that it goes back to the Social Security Act 1989. It deals with amendments that that is, the Social Security Administration Act 1992.

> "shall be deemed to have had effect as from the commencement of the 1992 Act"——

The Minister is relatively new to his job. Let me say to him what I have said to Social Security Ministers before him, and will no doubt say to his successors. The way in which we are scrutinising this legislation does not give us a proper opportunity to deal with the matters that I have raised.

It is black marks for the parliamentary draftsmen and departmental lawyers if they make mistakes allowing legislation to be capable of misinterpretation or misconstruction. If the Minister wishes to earn his pay as an Under-Secretary of State, he should go back to the Department and tear strips off those who produced this ambiguity. He should remind them of their duty to ensure that such things do not happen again.

Of course, our legislature has a duty to ensure that legislation is scrutinised properly; but guillotine motions do not help us to ensure that legislation is dealt with by the House in a proper and orderly fashion.

While welcoming the change, I think that it should not have happened in the first place. I consider that to be a serious point to which attention should be given.

The context of the debate is better informed as a result of the ninth report produced by the Social Security Advisory Committee. I quote from a press release dated 15 December:

> "In a final chapter" of the report,

> "the Report questions the view that social security spending"— which comes from the national insurance fund—

> "is out of control, but suggests that a fair, adequate and affordable social security system for those in need is essentially the preservation of the social fabric of the nation."

I strongly believe that that is true.

If we are getting into some of the cruder and more ideological comments made by Tory Members behind the Minister about the need to curtail expenditure and so on, that is a proper matter for political debate. However, I would prefer to focus carefully, as the SSAC report does, on examining how we plan the future growth of social security expenditure. There is a debate to be had about the growth of social security spending in the past because I want to ensure that every penny is used properly.

To give an example, at my party's last conference it was decided that if there is to be an increase in the pension provision, that increase should be targeted at and linked to the earnings of those who are on income support and means-tested benefits. We are struggling to see how we can constrain the growth of social security spending from the national insurance fund.

There are some worrying implications in what Tory Members said about not believing in growth. I am prepared to argue about how we spend the growth in social security expenditure. However, if we are starting to talk about real cuts in social security provision, the SSAC report is right: we start looking at the "social fabric of the nation" and how it will be eroded.

If the Government do not pay through the benefit system, they will need to pick it up through criminality, drug abuse and all the other downstream effects that will result from taking money out of the pockets of those who need it most. I recommend the Social Security Advisory Committee report. I know that the hon. Members for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) are experts on social security. I hope that they will examine the report.

Mr. Bates rose——

Mr. Kirkwood: I will not give way.

There are some unfair, hidden tax increases in the Bill. The hon. Member for Garscadden deployed the case eloquently. I shall reinforce what he said, but I will not repeat his comments. The vast majority of people do not think all that far ahead. Low-income families have a week-to-week view of life, because that is the way in which their finances stretch. I do not think that they are properly apprised of the sort of difficulties they will face when the tax increases bite in the new financial year. To start thinking about increases of the level of £9 per week in 1994-95 and £16 per week in the 1995-96 fiscal year will not provide difficulties only for low-income families. It will bite into the disposable income that is available for middle-income families.

We tend properly to concentrate on financially disadvantaged households in social security debates, and it is right that we do so. But looking at the changes that will flow after 6 April 1994, I think that many middle-income families will have real difficulties. Although they may have reasonably big incomes in terms of their net take-home pay, they also have a corresponding level of commitments.

I do not know whether the Government have done any research on this. When they make changes of this magnitude, I certainly hope that they do research so that they can measure the exact impact of such changes on the balance of disposable income for middle-income families.

I am nervous about how the changes will play out for middle-income groups. I hope that the Minister will say something about that later. Low-income and middle-income families will find it difficult to cope with the totality of the tax increases—something like £15,000 million in 1995-96, and the national insurance increases provided in the Bill are about one sixth of that tax take.

Earlier, I said that, if the national insurance fund is increased, it should be increased in order that benefit expenditure can be correspondingly increased. In the Bill, we see changes in the benefits that are available. Those changes are an important element of it. The job seeker's allowance will be means-tested after six months.

Mr. Bates: The hon. Gentleman has made some prize comments about the speeches of my hon. Friends. I draw his attention to something that he said:

> "The national insurance contribution system is now so shot through with anomalies and piecemeal reforms that we should start again from scratch."—[Official Report, 30 November 1992; Vol. 215, c. 73.]

Is that still the hon. Gentleman's view?

Mr. Kirkwood: I know I should not have given way, because the hon. Gentleman has anticipated the final part of my speech.

I said that the Bill provides for cuts in benefit. The job seeker's allowance will be means-tested after six months. Sickness benefits and invalidity benefit will be translated into incapacity benefit. That benefit will be liable to tax, and there will be tighter medical tests.

Another matter that must be taken into account is that the age of eligibility for the state pension for women is being changed to 65 years. As hon. Members know, that is being phased in between the years 2010 and 2020. Savings are being made simultaneously with an increase in national insurance contributions of about £2·5 billion by 1996-97 for the job seeker's allowance and the sickness benefit and invalidity benefit changes, and about £5,000 million by the year 2025 for the change in the pension age. Increasing national insurance contributions at the same time as making those swingeing reductions in benefits is adding insult to injury.

Anyone who studies objectively the imbalance that has occurred in the national insurance fund can see clearly that it has been occasioned by a combination of lower earnings and increased unemployment. The obvious answer to that strays outside the scope of this debate. Urgent attention is needed to promote growth and generate more employment.

I ask the Minister to consider that one of the consequences of the increases will be that people will start to examine ways of getting round them. There are many benefits in kind which do not apply to national insurance contributions. I shall list a few of them for the Minister's consideration. For example, company cars, beneficial loans, private medical and dental attention, general expenses allowances, travel and subsistence allowances, entertainment, home telephone expenses which are paid or reimbursed and mobile telephone expenses escape national insurance contributions.

If the Government are going down the road of not increasing general taxation—I think that would be a much more honest and straightforward way of raising public expenditure—they will need seriously to examine some of the benefits in kind which people will start to use or misuse in the future. We should pay attention to that matter.

I should like to conclude by considering the future of the contributory principle of the national insurance fund, as I promised the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates). I agreed with what the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) said in his interesting speech. He knows a great deal about the subject, and we have had many discussions about it over the years.

I believe that we need to reform the national insurance contributory fund fundamentally. My opinion is reinforced by the Bill, because it is quite unforgivable for the Government to raid the national insurance fund in this way.

I know that any reform would take time and would be difficult to introduce. It would take some explanation for people to understand that they no longer had entitlement to benefits. We must, however, consider how we plan to finance social security expenditure. There is a case for doing away with the contributory principle.

We should be more honest and say that the future system should be based on a pay-as-you-go principle. The necessary money should be taken out of general taxation. That would make it easier for Governments of whatever political stripe to make better future provision, which is intelligible to ordinary people.

The Bill is important. It deserves serious scrutiny, and I am sorry that it has been guillotined. The Government, however, have not made their case properly, although I believe that it is difficult for them to make a legitimate case for increasing the costs of employees through their national insurance contributions while using other mechanisms to reduce the benefits available through that very same fund.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): I do not pretend to be an expert in social security, but it would be a poor day if hon. Members could not consider legislation that is important to their constituents unless they were experts in it. I found the comments of certain Opposition Members extremely patronising.

It particularly ill behoves the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) to make such comments when his party cannot come up with a consistent policy if it tries. In the Budget debate, the Liberals' Treasury spokesman, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) emphasised the importance of the contributory principle, but the hon. Gentleman has just suggested that it should be abolished. That inconsistency demonstrates that we are back on the old Liberal game of a thousand blooms on every branch.

What has been startlingly absent from the debate is an appreciation of the difficulties of funding the type of system that we want for the future. I asked the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) how he would fund the deficit in the national insurance fund. He did not offer a proper answer but gave a bit of fudge here and a bit of mudge there. It is all very well to speak in lofty tones about Beveridge, full employment and other vital issues, but if one cannot say where the money for all that will come from, one is dead.

In the 1992-93 report, the Government Actuary said that the fund required extra money and that one way of providing that would be to increase national insurance contributions. There may be alternative means of raising that money, but the Opposition cannot criticise the Government's proposals in the Bill unless they have such an alternative.

It is not right to argue that full employment will be provided by increasing benefits. When Beveridge looked at the system he said that the starting point was full employment. These days, those countries with full employment are not those with the most over-weighty social and welfare provisions; they include Japan and Taiwan, not France and Germany. Today in Europe, 20 million people are unemployed. We must consider the future. If we want to return to full employment, we must ask ourselves how to achieve that. One way of doing so is to keep the social burden off employers' backs.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): Such as sick pay.

Mr. Heald: I did not catch that sedentary intervention. We are trying to remove the burdens on business so that it can be more competitive. Every major employers' group argues that that is necessary. Opposition Members argue that employees' national insurance contributions should remain at their low level, but that is not possible to achieve unless we increase taxation. If we did that, it would be extremely damaging to British industry.

It is typical that the overlap between national insurance payments for unemployment benefit and income support hardly rates a mention in Opposition Members' speeches. Of those who are unemployed and receiving benefit, 70 per cent. are on income support. The rules governing income support and unemployment benefit are inconsistent, cumbersome and dealt with by different offices. Surely it is right that that system should be reformed. I cannot believe that Opposition Members would disagree.

The Government have grasped the nettle to make that change and, at the same time, they have targeted the new job seeker's allowance in order to help people to get back to work. It is not as though anyone will lose as a result of that; rather they will gain, because the job seekers agreement will set them clear targets. The hon. Member for East Kilbride (Mr. Ingham) may smile, but the success of the job club scheme shows that such measures work. Under the job seeker's grant, people will be given the help they need to go out to look for work.

Mr. Wicks: Is there not an inconsistency in the hon. Gentleman's argument? He seemed to argue that mass unemployment is now a fact of life and that, as testimony to that, it exists in foreign parts. He also supports the idea of the job seeker's allowance. Surely the notion behind it is that there are enough jobs out there to be sought, if only we got the benefits and the help right. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. Does he see a future of mass unemployment or does he genuinely believe that we can provide a system under which people can not only seek jobs but find them?

Mr. Heald: I am optimistic about the future, so long as we take the right measures. We must remove the burdens from business and train young people and those in work. We should give them the help that they need to find the jobs for which they are suited. The Government are taking such measures, but too often without the support of the Opposition. Their support should be forthcoming because those measures are in the interests of everyone.

When the Labour party was in office, its record on national insurance was appalling. Under the Labour Government, employers' national insurance contributions stood at 13·5 per cent. and those of employees stood at 6·5 per cent. According to today's national insurance figures, someone earning £70 a week would, under Labour, have total costs of £14, whereas under the Conservatives that person costs £4·96. Under Labour, someone earning £130 would have total national insurance costs of £26, whereas under the Conservatives he costs £15. That shows that the Conservatives have removed the burden from businesses.

The Labour party has not changed its spots. One need only study the shadow Budget, produced before the general election, to see that, because it proposed to remove the upper earnings limit. That would have meant that people who would have to pay higher contributions would be ripped off because they would not get the earnings-related addition to which they were entitled. That proposal was also fundamentally unpopular because people do not want to pay higher taxes. They want a liberated economy in which taxes are lower so that they can reap the benefits of their enterprise.

Mr. Wicks: The comparisons with the previous Labour Government are helpful. Can the hon. Gentleman inform the House of the cost of public spending on unemployment under that Labour Government compared with the costs under the Conservative Government? Would he care to speculate about how high expenditure on unemployment now impacts on taxes? What is the overall burden of taxes on the average family now compared to what it was under the Labour Government?

Mr. Heald: I do not think that I shall have time to do that. I shall be happy to discuss that afterwards with the hon. Gentleman. If we had a socialist Government in the country now, we would have the same sort of system as in socialist countries abroad. If one considers what is happening in France—high unemployment and rising youth unemployment—it is not difficult to see that we do not want that in Britain, and that we must continue with the vigorous policies of this Conservative Government.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): The Second Reading speeches have been somewhat uneven and they have been worsened by a guillotine on this important Bill. In the time that we have available, we cannot go down the route of further criticism of that Government decision, but it has rather curtailed an important debate that I hope that we can continue in Committee.

The speeches by some hon. Members have been extremely eloquent and thoughtful. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) especially, as well as to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) who opened the debate.

In the short time available I would like to reinforce some of the points that have been made and to demand answers to some of the questions that have been asked, which I would like the Minister to answer in winding up. It is important to note that most people in the country believe that the national insurance scheme is a partnership between the individual and state. Most individuals who contribute to [illegible] scheme do so on the understanding that it establishes, in principle, their entitlement to benefits if earnings are interrupted. The average man or woman, who has contributed to the fund during their working life, is being conned by the Government. The view of national insurance as a tax equivalent means that, contrary to the theory, the Government are able to increase contributions without introducing corresponding increases in benefits and, at the same time, erode the value of those benefits.

As we have heard, this one-clause Bill is about the 1 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions from 9 to 10 per cent. and is on top of the previous increase in the standard rate of national insurance contributions from 6·5 per cent. to 9 per cent. and the abolition of the ceiling on employers' contributions. Overall, the amount raised in contributions has increased relative to other forms of tax and in terms of the percentage charged on most earnings. Much of this year's tax revenue will come from higher national insurance contributions and, as we know, the 1 per cent. increase in rates for employees and the self-employed will raise a staggering £2·26 billion in revenue in a full year. Significantly, that is £360 million more than a penny rise in the basic rate of income tax.

National insurance is a regressive tax and will hit those much lower down the income scale than income tax, so that half a million people who are too poor to pay income tax will nevertheless pay national insurance. As we have already heard, a good example of that is the nursing auxiliary who earns around £6,000 a year and will pay an extra 38p a week in national insurance. However, if there were a penny rise in the basic rate of tax, that person would pay absolutely nothing more.

[Mr. Keith Bradley]

The Government explain the increase in terms of the cost of contributory benefits. They put forward the view that it is right, in principle, that existing contributions should pay for contributory benefits. I do not dissent from that view. However, it is interesting to note that, in an interview on "Newsnight" in July, the Secretary of State for Social Security admitted that he had great sympathy with people's gut feeling of having paid for something through their national insurance contributions. Yet that has not prevented the Government from reducing the real value of national insurance benefits time and again since 1979.

For example, the flat rate pension has been degraded by indexing its growth to prices rather than wages.

Mr. Heald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bradley: I shall give way once.

Mr. Heald: The hon. Gentleman will obviously remember the point that I made—how would the fund be paid for in future? Is the hon. Gentleman saying that Labour would reintroduce the link with earnings and, if so, how would it pay for it?

Mr. Bradley: We have heard the Back-Bench Conservative Members attacking the Labour party time and again. We are debating a Government measure. The Government have time and again broken their manifesto commitments—on VAT on fuel, on mortgage tax relief and on home insurance. We are here to debate Government policies and I intend to do so.

The House of Commons Library has estimated that the process of degrading pensions has knocked £19 off the value of a single pension. Had the same process been practised since 1948—we have heard much of Beveridge —today's single pension of £56·10 would be worth only £23 a week. Imagine an elderly person trying to live on that; yet, that is now the Government's chosen course.

The build-up of earnings-related supplements has also been virtually eliminated. The earnings-related supplement paid with unemployment benefit was abolished in 1992, while child dependency additions were abolished in 1984.

While SERPS entitlements remain, the adequacy of them is far from assured. Research shows that under the current rules, a person with a lifetime average earnings equal to the national average for males and retiring after 2009, would retire on a combined flat rate and a SERPS pension equal to 33 per cent. of gross earnings. That compares favourably with gross replacement rates of around 56 per cent. in Germany and between 59 per cent. and 71 per cent. in France. If the national insurance pension follows the declining course that is projected by Government's own figures, it is estimated that the gross replacement value for a state retirement pension will fall to between 33 per cent. and 27 per cent.

On top of all that, eligibility for benefits has become harder for individuals to establish. Partial benefits in return for a partial contribution have been virtually abolished. Payment of reduced rates of unemployment benefit for those with less than a full contribution record was abolished in 1986 and qualification for short-term benefits has been made more difficult by a recent contribution record via paid employment now being absolutely essential.

Numerous new regulations have been imposed to disqualify the jobless from receiving benefit. Unlike income tax, national insurance contributions which are overpaid—in that they are not sufficient to meet the declining eligibility for benefit—are not refunded and therefore a person wastes their individual contributions.

We have also heard questions about the new job seeker's allowance, which is the latest change that the Government are making to break the link between contributions paid and the rights to a contributory benefit. The allowance reduces the entitlement to benefit from 12 months to six months, which will remove 90,000 people from entitlement to any benefit after six months—50,000 men and 40,000 women. The means test involving six months rather than one year means that people will also lose entitlement to benefit as a result of spouses' earnings.

We must ask serious questions on that. Will the Secretary of State confirm whether there will be additional payments for adult dependants with the contributory job seeker's allowance? Will he clarify the plans to base the rate of the job seeker's allowance on income support rates for those under 25 years? Does not that mean that there will be a reduced rate of benefit for all unemployed people under the age of 25 years, as pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden? We need clear answers to those questions.

The new incapacity benefit will be taxable and subject to more stringent medical tests than is the case for invalidity benefit. It will be harder to get than invalidity benefit and it will be paid at a lower level. Will the Minister explain the principle that lies behind this contributory benefit? Two people living in the same street, in the same financial and social circumstances, and in the same physical state, could receive two different benefits. One could receive invalidity benefit and the other could receive a substantially reduced incapacity benefit. One benefit is taxed whereas the other is not. That will not only make a farce of the contributory principle, but will be a slap in the face of social justice.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden, I raise the point about the future of the basic pension, which we have mentioned already. I refer to the recent comments by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury which may confirm our worst fears about the future of the pension. If his comments are anything to go by, no one under the age of 40 should expect to have a state pension on which to rely in old age. I know that that view differs from the Chancellor's view. Will the Minister make clear tonight on which side of the debate the Social Security team sits? Do the Secretary of State and his team support the undying principle of basic pension or do they support the Treasury team's view that it will ultimately wither and die, and that everyone will make alternative provision? Where do the Secretary of State and his team stand on that matter?

All the cuts have been made in spite of the increase in national insurance contributions, which the Government claim has occurred to pay for contributory benefits. People are effectively told to keep on paying higher national insurance contributions, but not to expect anything in return. Understandably, such a policy is a cause for concern for those anxious about their future security. People must wonder where their years of contributions are rapidly disappearing. At the least, people should be informed of the reality of national insurance contributions, which is that they provide the Government with a means of raising taxation by the back door. They have little to do with the national insurance scheme as people understand it.

People can no longer have confidence in the Government's claim to be the party of low taxation. Over and over again, the promises made in the election about the Conservatives the party of low taxation have been broken. The Tory manifesto says:

> "We will maintain mortgage tax relief."

What have we had? The value of mortgage tax relief has been reduced in this Budget since the election. The manifesto says:

> "We are the only party that understands the need for low taxation."

What has happened? We have had the biggest hike in taxation in history. We have had the biggest hike of 7p in the pound, to which the Chancellor himself has admitted. People will be paying on average an extra £9 a week in taxation next year and an extra £16 a week the year after. They need an explanation.

We will oppose the Bill tonight because the changes in national insurance contributions are part of the way in which the Government are getting out of the hole caused by their economic mismanagement. The changes are a way in which to try to dupe the public into believing that national insurance is making a contribution to real benefits in the future rather than an effort to plug a hole in the Government's finances.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. William Hague): For the second day running, we have had an interesting debate, with many varied contributions. I shall try to answer many of the detailed points put throughout the debate, including the questions asked by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar).

The hon. Gentleman began his speech with a number of clear truths. He said that it was a short, simple Bill; indeed it is. He said that it could be argued that the Bill was needed simply to pay for increased expenditure out of the national insurance fund. He said that, in a sense, that was true. It is true in every sense.

The Bill's purpose is to bring the national insurance fund nearer to balance. The expenditure of the national insurance fund is much higher than its income—£5 billion higher. Its expenditure next year will be higher than it has been in the current year. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) said that national insurance contributions should be increased only so that expenditure on benefits out of the fund could be increased. That is the purpose of the increase. Expenditure out of the fund will be higher in 1994-95 than in 1993-94. That is why we seek to put more money into the fund for the financial year 1994-95.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire raised a point about the retrospective provisions in clause 2. Interestingly, he was the only hon. Member to raise that point—a point that we shall remember when we deal with some of the amendments in Committee. Like him, I am not enthusiastic about retrospective legislation. The provisions arise from the Social Security Act 1989, in which a drafting error was clearly made. There was an error by the Government and then an error by Parliament in passing the Act.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman's recognition that a change needs to be made. It needs to be made to give proper legal cover for the money that passes out of the national insurance fund to go towards the costs of the national health service. Ministers decided, as soon as we were aware of the mistake, that we should take the first opportunity to correct it. That is what we are doing in the Bill and that aim should be supported by the whole House.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire also raised the important questions of benefits in kind and differences between the income tax system and the national insurance contributions system. He may have seen the recent report of the tax and national insurance contributions working group which was established by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Kirkwood indicated dissent.

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman obviously has not seen it; I strongly commend it to him because it makes extremely good reading. My right hon. Friend published the report in October. One of the working groups's main suggestions was that the definition of earnings should be aligned on the tax base, which would make subject to national insurance contributions all taxable benefits in kind and any vouchers regarded as earnings for tax purposes. We intend to consult the business community far more widely about the proposals next year and to discuss how they might be implemented. The working group outlined several different ways in which one might approach the alignment of the two systems. We recognise the importance of what the hon. Gentleman has said; he made an entirely valid point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) made an entertaining and well-informed speech, drawing in much detail from the briefing used to a much greater extent by Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen. Yesterday, they used CBI briefings; today, they employed briefings from the Conservative research department. I do not know what has gone wrong with the services of Labour party headquarters. Clearly, they are not supplying much material to Labour Members at the moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire pointed out that, after the increase, the lowest-paid would still pay lower national insurance contributions than the contributions that they paid in 1979. That is an extremely important point. He also reminded the House that the Bill reflected the Government's commitment to sound finance, a commitment that was also clear in the Budget.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) made a thoughtful speech, as the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) said. I did not agree with all of it. He said, for example, that the basis of indexation of pensions increases should not have been changed. We all have to consider that the implication of not changing the basis of indexation would be that expenditure from the national insurance fund would be £8·5 billion more than it is today. The hon. Gentleman and the Labour party in general must consider how they would have financed that increase through the 1980s. That is the problem that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire had at his party conference. He was overruled by the Liberal Democrats of the nation, despite his insistence on a particular pensions policy.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North-West referred to the future state pension age. There are powerful reasons for equalisation at 65, including the position of occupational pension schemes, international trends and the need to ensure that the system is affordable in the future. That issue runs through many of our deliberations about the national insurance fund and the social security system. It is our responsibility to ensure that the system is affordable in the future. Although some hon. Members argued that there should be no difficulty with that, the simple projection is that, although expenditure on pensions is just under £30 billion a year now, it is likely to be more than £60 billion in the 2020s and 2030s. That is only on the basis of indexation with prices. Those issues must be borne in mind.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North-West made two important points. One was about the level of unemployment in the future. He asked how much we could predict the future level of unemployment. My hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) pointed out the difficulties faced by economists in forecasting future levels of employment. All that we do in the Government forecast is make stylised assumptions about the needs for next year. The assumption for next year is 2·75 million. Today, unemployment fell to lower than the stylised assumption in the Government's forecast. That is the limit of what we can forecast in calculating what we need next year, and for the national insurance fund, which is what the debate is about.

My hon. Friend's most important point was to show how the social security system needs to change over time. There is a fair amount of common ground in some parts of the House on the idea that the system needs to change and evolve, and sometimes to be reformed. Sometimes it has to be refocused. We have to check that it is meeting the needs of society in the right way. That has important implications for the national insurance fund.

The national insurance fund cannot be compared to a single-risk commercial insurance system. It cannot operate like a funded insurance system in which a specific contribution buys an absolute right for ever to a specific return. The national insurance fund is a pay-as-you-go system which relies on the ability of current contributors to pay in a sufficient amount to provide for expenditure on benefits which are currently payable. Social security schemes must be able to evolve, and as such, any Government must be able to make adjustments to the structure of the system to meet changing circumstances.

That is the point with which many people agree, including the hon. Members for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and for Croydon, North-West and the Government. The only people who do not recognise that the social security system sometimes needs to be reformed are Opposition Front-Bench Members who, in these debates, often remind me of the Duke of Wellington in 1832 telling the other place that the British constitution had been created so perfectly in the first place that no improvement on it could possibly be devised.

Yesterday, Opposition Front-Bench Members came to the House to defend the statutory sick pay system, the establishment of which they opposed 10 years ago. They have opposed every change to it. There they sit, glumly, a range of exhausted volcanoes, unable to come up with any ideas for the future, having privatised that activity and farmed it out to the Commission for Social Justice.

Dr. Godman: When will the English Court of Appeal hear the appeal lodged by the Secretary of State and the chief adjudication officer against the decision taken by Commissioner Skinner on 1 April 1992 about the payment of invalidity benefit to women aged between 60 and 65? Is it likely that the Secretary of State will seek a referral to the European Court of Justice?

Mr. Hague: On 26 July, the Court of Appeal adjourned the hearing of the appeal, which will now take place on either 14 of 15 February 1994. The listing of the hearing date is a judicial matter for the Court of Appeal. Obviously, we shall have to await the outcome before we decide how to proceed.

Dr. Godman: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hague: I must press on with the rest of my speech. I was referring to the need for change——

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I point out that I suspect that the Minister, adventitiously, is misleading the House, because the Secretary of State and the chief adjudication officer asked for the postponement?

Mr. Hague: If I am misleading the House, I am certainly not doing so deliberately, but I am happy to talk about the matter. I gave the hon. Gentleman a straight answer and I shall be happy to discuss it with him on all other occasions.

Let us return to the Bill and to its purpose. It recognises that any responsible Administration must take action to ensure that they meet commitments and obligations, such as to pay pensions and to pay the benefits that come out of the national insurance fund. It is critical to ensure that enough money goes into that fund to pay those benefits.

It is important to recognise, when we make the change that we are debating tonight, that we have greatly improved the national insurance system since 1979. We have introduced a 2 per cent. rate that applies under the lower earnings limit for the lower paid. We have made huge reductions in the national insurance contributions paid by employers, which were a tax on jobs in 1979 of 13·5 per cent. The contributions are now 3·6 to 10·2 per cent. and are lowest for the lowest paid.

Opposition Members are often content to mouth concern about the low-paid, but tax them out of work when they get into power. Has it ever occurred to them that one reason why unemployment is falling, to the utter astonishment of economists and Opposition Members, is that we do not have a tax on jobs to the extent that we had in the 1970s under Labour Governments?

Let us compare the total level of employees' and employers' national insurance contributions in 1979 and now. Next year, the employers' and employees' contibution for someone earning £250 a week will be £46. What was it in 1979? Opposition Members should know. It was £50. What about the low-paid? For someone on £130 a week, the contribution next year will be £16. The contribution in 1979 was £26. Let us look at the really low-paid. For someone on £70 a week, the contribution next year is £5. In 1979, it was £14. That is how the level of national insurance contributions has changed over that time.

Opposition Members have failed to face up to the fact that if one does not pay for national insurance benefits by increasing the income of the national insurance fund directly, one must pay it in some other way. That is a truth that they shy away from and do not like to discuss.

We waited to hear in the speeches of Opposition Front-Bench Members what their proposals were. The hon. Member for Garscadden referred to a larger Treasury grant, as though it were a huge pot of money into which hon. Members or Governments could dip their sticky fingers whenever they wanted. The Treasury grant can be increased only if the extra money comes out of other forms of taxation.

The Opposition have said that they are opposed to an increase in national insurance contributions, but they have set no alternative before the House. They have come here with a sense of grievance and outrage at the measure. The sense of outrage is so strong that when the hon. Member for Garscadden launched his speech, fully 14 of his hon. Friends made the long journey to the Chamber to hear his attack. It was an attack so impressive and dramatic in its content that 10 of his hon. Friends were still here at the end of his remarks. That shows the intensity of the outrage felt by Opposition Members.

How would the hon. Gentleman fill the gap? Would he raise the money in a different way? Would he abolish the upper earnings limit, as the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mrs. Kennedy) suggested? Evidently, she did not clear her lines with Opposition Front Benchers, who say that that is no longer appropriate, that they have modernised their policy. They will have to modernise one or two of their Back Benchers if they are to make their argument stick together.

Would the Opposition pay for it from general taxation? Perhaps they would, but they forget that a large percentage of pensioners pay general taxation. Why should pensioners have to pay for the contributory benefits for which they have paid throughout their working lives? There is a powerful case for having contributory benefits funded by people who pay national insurance contributions.

Would the Opposition fund the system by closing a loophole? The hon. Member for Garscadden referred to a loophole—the idea put about by the shadow Chancellor that everything, including the funding of the national insurance fund, the general burden of taxation and every crackpot project thought up by Labour Members, can be funded by closing some vast and previously unsuspected loophole that has escaped the attention of everyone else in the nation, and of every Chancellor in recent decades.

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to the Order [14 December].

Clause 1

INCREASE IN PRIMARY CLASS 1 CONTRIBUTIONS

8.25 pm

Mr. Adam Ingram (East Kilbride): It is most unusual to commence the Committee stage of such an important Bill just 15 minutes after it has received its Second Reading. Usually hon. Members are allowed a reasonable number of days to examine and reflect on what the Minister said on Second Reading and to consider the other speeches, although, given some of the contributions from the Government Benches during today's debate, little reflection would be necessary. That opportunity has been denied us tonight, as it was last night in the same way during our proceedings on the Statutory Sick Pay Bill.

Usually, having considered the debate, there is an opportunity to consider the clauses in great detail and to submit suitable amendments. Sadly, that is not to be because the Government are forcing the Bill through for reasons which were dealt with in detail during the debate on the guillotine motion. I am sure that if I started to go through all those arguments again, Mr. Lofthouse, you would rule me out of order, so I have no intention so to do.

Because of the procedure imposed by the Government, and to ensure that we continue the debate constructively and build on the many important points raised by the Opposition, we have chosen to have a clause stand part debate immediately. Many crucial matters at the heart of Government taxation policy were raised on Second Reading. As they were not adequately dealt with in the Government responses—certain specific questions were asked, but not answered—this debate gives us a further opportunity to probe those issues and concerns.

On the surface, clause 1 appears to be fairly innocuous. Anyone who is not versed in the obscure terminology used in drafting Bills could be led to think that the clause does not amount to much. To put the matter in context and so that we can better grasp its content, it is worth reading the clause. Subsection (1) states:

> "In section 8 of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 (calculation of primary Class 1 contributions), in subsection (2)(b) (by virtue of which the main primary percentage is 9 per cent.) for '9 per cent.' substitute '10 per cent.'."

Subsection (2) is easier to understand:

I thought long and hard about how the clause had come about. I knew what it meant after I had worked my way through the verbiage, but I could not quite work out how a Government who go on and on about being a tax-cutting Government could introduce a Bill, the main clause of which imposes a massive tax increase on the British people. I found that difficult to comprehend. I pondered the matter and I anticipated the possible reason. Then, suddenly, it came to me like a flash of divine inspiration.

I visualised the Cabinet meeting when all that took place. There they were, sitting round the Cabinet table, each and every one of them a senior Minister of State. The Chancellor was telling them that the Government—not exactly this Government and not exactly under this Chancellor—had made a terrible mess of the economy during the past 14 years, so something drastic needed to be done. He called for them to speak up if they had any ideas about how to get the Government out of the hole in which they found themselves.

Up popped the Secretary of State for Social Security —he might even pop up tonight. He said, "Please, Sir, please, Sir. I have an idea. I know what we should do. I have a little list. We should punish the sick, the disabled and the poor and impose new taxes on the working people of Britain. They should pay for the Government's mistakes. Why don't we increase national insurance contributions?"

That is exactly what the Government did and that is why we have the Bill. The clause, stripped of its legal verbiage, increases employees' national insurance contributions from 9 per cent. to 10 per cent.—coupled with the national insurance contribution increases on the self-employed—and will take an extra £2·26 billion out of the pockets of those workers. That is £360 million more in taxes than if the Government had put 1p on the basic rate of income tax.

As we would expect from the Government, that increase is designed to hit those on low wages harder than those on top salaries. National insurance contributions apply more to those lower down the pay scale than income tax does. That means that half a million workers too poor to pay income tax will nevertheless pay national insurance contributions. [illegible] my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) pointed out on Second Reading, the poor pay more with national insurance increases.

[Mr. Adam Ingram]

Examples of the effect of the increase have already been given, but it is worth doing so again during this clause stand part debate. The 1 per cent. rise in national insurance contributions will mean that a shop assistant earning £6,000 a year will pay an extra 38p a week in contributions, whereas a 1p rise in the basic rate of tax would cost nothing.

The rise in national insurance contributions will also hit those on middle incomes more than the very rich. A company secretary earning £430 a week—just over £22,000 a year—will pay £3·75 extra in national insurance contributions, which is nearly 1 per cent. of his wage. However, a senior executive earning £220,000 a year will pay exactly the same—£3·75 a week—in extra national insurance contributions, which is less than 0·1 per cent. of his salary. All that is against the assurances given by the Prime Minister when he told the House on 28 January 1992 that he had

"no plans to raise . . . the level of national insurance contributions."—[Official Report, 28 January 1992; Vol. 202, c. 808.]

I wonder why the Prime Minister was not prepared to be more honest with the House and the country on that issue.

While the Prime Minister was trying to conceal the truth, his Chancellor has been much more honest. A headline in the Daily Mail today says, "Clarke Comes Clean". That, as my hon. Friends have pointed out, is an admission by the Chancellor that the 1 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions is part of the biggest tax hike in our history. It is an admission that what is laid down in clause 1 is part of the—there is a debate about whether it is £9 or £10 so, for argument's sake, I shall say £9—increase in taxes that the average family will have to pay next year and part of the £16 a week increase in taxes the year after.

The Chancellor may have come clean with the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee yesterday, but we now know that he is playing dirty with the British people. As my hon. Friends have pointed out during the debate, higher national insurance contributions are characteristic of this pay-more-get-less Tory Government.

This is not the first increase in contributions that the Government have introduced. The standard rate was increased from 6·5 per cent. to 9 per cent. in the 1980s. What is most striking and most cynical is that those rises were never accompanied by an improvement in the level of national insurance benefits. The recently announced reductions in unemployment benefit are only the latest and most blatant example of that more-for-less policy. Merging unemployment benefit with income support to produce the job seeker's benefit is a cynical ploy wrapped up in a semantic change.

Cutting the contributory element from 12 to six months will remove 90,000 people from entitlement to any benefit after six months—50,000 men and 40,000 women. Cutting benefits to raise money is the traditional approach of a Tory Government who have created their own fiscal crisis. Beyond that obvious short-termism is a more damaging policy—the destruction of the contributory principle to the national insurance fund. All that is relevant to clause 1.

My hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden earlier demanded that the Secretary of State should tell us whether there is to be a new reduced rate of benefit for unemployed people under 25. I am sure that those young people would like to know. That question was repeated by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley), but no answer was given.

Unemployment benefit is paid on a non-means-tested basis because that is how people expect the system to work. They pay into the national insurance fund on the understanding that doing so entitles them to benefits, irrespective of other factors such as age. What matters, or used to matter, is the number of contributions made. That is the basis of a contractual relationship, and it is the basis on which the fund was established.

In the past, people could expect that paying national insurance contributions would provide for their security in their old age. We know exactly what the Secretary of State and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury now think of that principle. What an insulting message has gone out to the British people. On the other hand, they have been told that they must contribute more to the national insurance fund, but on the other, they have been told that they must make their own pension provision because what they will get from the fund will be nugatory. That is what the Chief Secretary has said about future pension provision, following his famous put-down of the "No, not now, not ever" Secretary of State for Social Security.

The Government have a clear agenda of increasing taxes and reducing benefit. That means reducing unemployment benefit, invalidity benefit and pension entitlement. Research estimates have shown that, if the current approach to pensions uprating had been in place since 1948, today's £56·10 single pension would be worth only £23 a week. I am sure that everyone will agree that no one could live on that. We have heard such a payment described as not worth a bag of nuts. Perhaps that should be rephrased and the payment described as being worth only a bag of nugatories.

The long march through benefit levels has been accompanied by a systematic programme of making them harder to obtain and the link between contributions and entitlement has been consistently eroded. Receiving partial benefits for partial contributions is almost a thing of the past. The qualification for short-term benefits has been made more difficult while at the same time regulations have increased to cut off the jobless from benefit.

The Government's approach to the management and financing of the national insurance fund shows a clear contempt for the contributory principle and for the needs of the British people for security against illness, poverty and unemployment and in old age. The national insurance system operates on the basis of the trust and consent of contributors. Clause 1 and the benefit changes that accompany it in the two Budgets this year are an affront to that trust and consent.

The previous Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of the urgent need to address the deficit in the fund. He said:

"when a deficit of this size emerges in the fund, it is natural to look to all contributors to make up the balance."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 179.]

Last night, we debated the scandalous proposals to cut statutory sick pay. During that debate it became clear that reductions in employers' national insurance contributions were used as a bribe to persuade companies to take their new sick pay obligations lying down.

In their zeal to cut benefit expenditure, the Secretary of State for Social Security and the Chancellor have made it impossible to ask all contributors to make up the deficit.

Consequently, the burden of propping up the depleted national insurance fund is being placed on employees on middle and low incomes.

This debate will allow the Minister to deal with the many issues raised on Second Reading. I am sure that my hon. Friends who contribute to it will pose further questions for him to answer. In the light of the debate that surrounded the Budget, does the Minister think that such a massive tax rise as the one prescribed by the increase in national insurance contributions is justified? Will he let us into a little secret and tell us what alternatives to the national insurance scheme were considered and then rejected by the Cabinet, or must we wait until the next unified Budget before we learn of the next increase in contributions and cuts in benefit?

On Second Reading, reference was also made to the half a million people who are too poor to pay income tax, but will be expected to pay national insurance contributions. I have said the same during consideration of this clause. Will the Minister confirm that figure, or does he have a different figure to give the House?

Other questions were raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Garscadden and for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley). Will the Secretary of State confirm whether additional payments for adult dependants will remain, once the contributory job seeker's allowance has been introduced? Will he clarify that the basic rate of job seeker's allowance for those under 25 years of age on income support will not mean a reduced rate of benefit for all unemployed people aged 25? Those questions were asked twice on Second Reading. I appreciate that we are only 15 minutes away from that debate, but I should have thought that the Minister had had time to reflect on them. If his colleague could not answer in his summing up on Second Reading, perhaps we can have the answers in relation to this clause.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): I wish to discuss the proposed cuts in invalidity benefit, which is funded out of national insurance contributions. Since early this year, rumours of cuts in that benefit have created fear and uncertainty. I am worried that that fear and uncertainty for people currently receiving invalidity benefit will continue because they will be subject to stricter reviews if they are to continue receiving benefit. Many people who receive that benefit face having it removed.

The Government's rationale for that is the growth in the number of people receiving invalidity benefit. Indeed, that is their rationale for cutting all benefits—apparently, too many people receiving benefit cost too much. The Budget debate touched on some of the economic reasons why the Government seem unable to discharge their responsibilities as guardians of the welfare state. However, that is not the responsibility of the sick, who seem to have become the Government's new scapegoats, adding to a long list that includes trendy teachers, politically correct social workers, spendthrift councils, soft doctors, and women, particularly single mothers.

The Independent Policy Studies report shows that 29 per cent. of the growth in invalidity benefit has occurred because people are staying on invalidity benefit rather than taking retirement pension; 16 per cent. has occurred because more women are paying national insurance contributions, which makes them eligible for invalidity benefit; 13 per cent. is due to demographic reasons, in that there are more disabled people; and 42 per cent. is because of a genuine growth in the number of people claiming invalidity benefit among a stable population of disabled people. That is to do partly with new claimants and partly with the fact that people are staying on invalidity benefit longer.

The Government have deduced that, because of the increase in invalidity claimants at a time when the nation's health is supposed to have improved, the increase must relate to the fact that people are not really sick. Health statistics clearly show that ill health and disability are increasing in areas of poor income. I am worried that those people will be penalised by the new rules for eligibility.

The Government say that the problem is that GPs are too soft and take undue account of their patients' needs. They will not act effectively to control access to invalidity benefit. I suspect that that is a gross generalisation, as some doctors do assist claimants by providing ample information, and some do not. The Government also say that the benefit is used as an early retirement benefit and point to the number of men over the age of 50 receiving invalidity benefit, which was a deliberate Government policy to encourage people to take invalidity benefit to remove them from the unemployment register.

That is where the Government are acting extremely immorally. Some people who have taken early retirement receive invalidity benefit and face the possibility of the benefit being removed following a review. They considered that they had entered a contract, part of which was that they were retiring through ill health. Having retired early, they will now find that that benefit will not continue.

To establish an objective criteria, there is a clear cut-off point. It is difficult to be objective about people's illness because it depends on people's skills and the availability of jobs. It is worrying that certain categories of people who clearly cannot work—for instance, people with mental illness or ME——

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): My hon. Friend rightly spoke of the Government's contract with people who have retired in terms of what benefits they will receive. Does she agree that part of their contract is national insurance contributions? People believe that they will be eligible for benefit after retirement, in whatever circumstances. Is not that an important part of that argument?

Ms Coffey: I totally agree with my hon. Friend, who makes a valid point. Many people will be angry that the Government have reneged on their contracts and put them in difficult personal circumstances. We shall probably see a rerun of the complaints from the public, similar to those about the implementation of the Child Support Act 1991, the effect of which is a consequence of the criteria that were not transparent at the time——

8.45 pm

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I hesitate to intervene, but the hon. Lady is going rather wide of the clause. The debate is about contributions, not benefits.

Ms Coffey: I apologise, Mr. Lofthouse. I got carried away by a sudden insight into the comparison with the implementation of the Child Support Act.

Will the same hard criteria apply to the review of those currently receiving invalidity benefit as to new claimants?

[Ms Coffey]

The Minister is creating a new class of people that will consist of those who are not fit enough to work, and their position will be exacerbated by employers' obligations to fund sick pay. Yet those people will be unable to receive invalidity benefit. They will be rejected by employers and by the benefit system at a time when employers have choice because of the level of unemployment. Employers are not happy to employ people with any kind of sickness record. That is a serious problem.

The problem with such a cut in benefit is that it affects dramatically individual families' financial arrangements, about which it is difficult to make gross generalisations. As a reaction to that, we shall see a lot of anger and frustration and many people will feel let down because they have paid national insurance contributions all their lives and regard it as an insurance to protect them against the consequences of illness. Clearly, the Government are reneging on their contract with those people and people will feel betrayed.

Mr. Nicholas Scott: As the Committee will be aware, clause 1 is the principal clause in the Bill. As the Opposition spokesman acknowledged towards the end of Second Reading, this is essentially a one-clause Bill. Inevitably, therefore, the debate has added several questions to those raised, and in the main answered by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, on Second Reading.

The effect of the clause is to increase by 1 per cent. the rate of contributions made by employees who pay the main rate for the benefit.

The hon. Member for East Kilbride (Mr. Ingram) made several points about those who will be affected by the proposals. He asked for confirmation of the number of people whom he described as too poor to pay income tax but still liable to pay higher national insurance contributions.

Any employee whose earnings are below the tax threshold but who is still liable to pay NI contributions will earn entitlement to a whole range of contributory benefits in return for a relatively small contribution. It thus remains an extremely good deal for people affected in this way. Someone earning £65 a week will be entitled to a range of NI contributory benefits for between £1 and £2 a week. That represents good value for the people concerned.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) has asked me to apologise to hon. Members for not answering all their points in detail, because the guillotine came down. I understand the concern of those who have discussed the job seeker's allowance. Detailed questions of our policy for this benefit will be open to full debate at the time, but it would be only right to give hon. Members some idea of the answers that are likely to be delivered then.

We are concerned to ensure by means of the Bill that the national insurance fund can, for the immediate future, meet its expenditure commitments. None of the announced changes for the future will affect the fund for 1994-95, the year with which we are concerned today.

We were asked whether the job seeker's allowance would be uprated by reference to the retail prices index or to Rossi. The answer is Rossi. We were also asked whether the income support pattern—a lower rate of personal allowance for those under the age of 25—would be reflected in provision for the job seeker's allowance. I can confirm that on present plans it will be reflected in the new allowance. That is only right, since it reflects the lower earnings expectations of people under 25 and the fact that the vast majority of them do not live independently.

Mr. Dewar: I wish to challenge the Minister, although I recognise that he does not want to be involved in a full-scale debate on this—there will be time for that later. He really should face up to the problem, however. He knows that the income support differential which is apparently to be imported to the new job seeker's allowance is in itself controversial and has given rise to a good deal of bitterness. The Minister and I have personal experience of talking to people under 25 who have said that in some ways their living expenses are higher. There is no reason to suppose that a 24-year-old can live more cheaply than a 26-year-old. There is an arbitrary divide, which is reflected in a substantial differential in benefit. It will cause many people anger and distress to discover that the concept is being imported to the new job seeker's allowance—allegedly as an improvement.

Mr. Scott: I have certainly taken part in some vigorous debates, inside and outside the House, about the under-25 rate. Wherever one draws the line, it is bound to attract an element of controversy. The underlying principle—that younger people have lower earnings expectations than older people, and are generally less likely to be living independently—is correctly reflected in the provision that we make through the social security system to meet their need. It is therefore right that the principle used in income support should be reflected in the arrangements that we make for the job seeker's allowance.

Mr. Dewar: It is fundamentally misconceived to defend the idea in terms of lower expectations of earnings. The real test is living expenses. There is no reason to suppose that they are lower at 24 than at 25. That is the wrong starting point. Understandably, having started from the wrong place, the right hon. Gentleman has ended in the wrong place.

Mr. Scott: Within the social security system there is always a need to look at patterns of expenditure, and we take them into account as we make our judgments about levels of benefit.

There is another important aspect to the system as well —providing, to the greatest extent possible, incentives for people to get back into employment. If expectations of earnings are lower for one group than for an older group, yet the benefits paid tend to close the gap and thus reduce the incentive to get back into work, that is a negative aspect of the pattern of provision.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): Will the Minister cast his mind back to the time when the contributions rate was much lower and when there was an earnings-related element in unemployment benefit? Surely it is much fairer to have a standard flat rate entitlement, and different earnings expectations can be reflected in the additional premium incorporated as an earnings-related element.

Mr. Scott: We could argue this matter at great length and no doubt will do so when the new allowance is introduced. There will be ample opportunity then to conduct the discussion in the House. Whether I will still be a Social Security Minister then is a matter for debate, but if experience is anything to go by, I look forward to taking part in the discussions.

It is worth drawing attention to another aspect of the job seeker's allowance—what is known as the hours-allowed-for-partners rule. At the moment, the partner of someone in receipt of benefit may work for 16 hours a week without that being taken into account for purposes of entitlement to benefit. As the House knows, we plan to increase that, from 16 to 24 hours, for the job seeker's allowance.

Mr. Dewar: Our other query was about the dependant's allowance. The Minister is being very helpful so far.

Mr. Scott: A couple's allowance is planned, but not a dependent's allowance, in the sense to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

I should like to answer the points made by the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey). These matters will be subject to acute parliamentary scrutiny, I have no doubt, when we introduce the incapacity benefit, and the House will turn its mind to the subject when we return from our well-earned Christmas break. I do not want to go into that in detail, except to say that it is right that we should seek to return to a provision for incapacity for work due to disablement or sickness to the principle for which that was first established: that one must be incapable of work if one is to receive compensation. There are other benefits, through unemployment benefit and eventually through the job seeker's allowance, for those who are capable of work but who are unable to get work. Where incapacity manifestly is due to a medical condition, a separate benefit should be available.

It is common ground that entry to the benefit has been too slackly controlled in recent years and that that has led to a considerable increase in the case load for the present benefit at a time when the nation has never been healthier. There has been too little control also over the length of time which people have been able to stay on the benefit without a regular check that they are still entitled to it. As we design the new benefit, we will be at pains to see that those two factors, as well as several others, are taken into account to restore the underlying principle. That principle was the original intention of invalidity benefit and it will apply to the new incapacity benefit.

9. pm

Mr. Dewar: As people who read these debates usually do so with a malicious intent, I had better challenge the statement that there is "common ground" about the entry to invalidity benefit. The Minister will be familiar with the statistic that 53 per cent. of those who are refused invalidity benefit and who go to appeal succeed. That suggests that the benefit is nothing like the soft touch which Ministers seem to think. I would not want the Minister to get the idea that we concede that ground to him.

Mr. Scott: I may have overstated the degree, but I believe that there is a considerable common ground. In the first place, entry to the benefit is by general practitioners. They do not find the task of being a gatekeeper to invalidity benefit attractive. They are under all sorts of social and other pressures to sign people on, rather than applying a purely objective medical test.

We have looked at the appeals procedures and the rules which have applied and developed for invalidity benefit in recent years. We have seen a range of decisions from commissioners and others. Those have had the effect that many aspects of the benefit and the entitlement to benefit, other than those of a strictly medical kind, have been increasingly taken into account.

Ms Coffey: Does the Minister accept that it is difficult to establish objective medical criteria unless one is determining unfitness to work in terms of a specific disease? That is clearly illogical and absurd and may produce opinions which are less than objective, because, although someone may be suffering from a serious incapacity, it does not make them unfit for work.

Intermediate factors, such as tiredness, stress and mental health problems, also may create unfitness. People are concerned because invalidity benefit will in effect have a capping level. Will not the objective test, which does not exist, have little to do with the people who get the benefit, and will it not be determined more by the fact that only so much incapacity benefit can be given each year?

Mr. Scott: I look forward to discussing those matters in greater detail in the new year, no doubt with the hon. Lady and with others. We do not want to get into Committee stage on this Bill or even to the detail of Second Reading at the moment, but it is our intention to acknowledge that certain conditions would indeed class people on their entitlement to the new benefit. A certain number of conditions will be applied which manifestly render someone incapable of work. In addition, a number of functional tests will be applied and we are consulting widely the medical profession and organisations of and for disabled people on those tests.

Some private consultations have taken place and we will soon be taking part in more open consultations. The results of those consultations will be evaluated against a pilot number of real cases to see whether the evaluation and testing process is correct. That will take place in good time for the introduction of the new benefit. At that time, we will have arrived at a system of objective medical criteria which will be acceptable to the medical profession and which will be clearly understood to be fair and reasonable by those applying for the benefit and by the public. If I go on much further on incapacity benefit, I am in danger of anticipating a number of discussions which we will have when we return from our holidays.

Mr. Dewar: This will be my last intervention on this point, although not necessarily my last on other matters. I am curious about the methodology and the hint given by the Minister about tests which will be carried out on a group. That group would be processed under the new regulations to see whether the Department had got it right. I recognise that it is often difficult to pin down the criteria. To use a parallel, there is an endless argument about the failure rate in examinations where there is a preconceived notion of the number of people who should or should not qualify. I recognise that many hon. Members are shaking their heads, but it is important to establish the facts.

Mr. Scott: I agree that it is an important point. When we were asked to provide an estimate of the numbers who would become entitled to benefit against those who would not qualify for the new benefit, certain figures were given because we were asked to give some assessment, but it was only the best guess that we could make.

I assure the House that we have no intention of setting a target or setting the criteria to achieve that target. We shall set out a clear, objective test which will be acceptable to the medical profession and others and will be perceived as fair throughout the country. Those who pass will get the benefit and those who do not pass will not. If more or fewer people fail, we will have to adapt our expectations.

Mr. Rooney: I am grateful to the Minister for his honesty and openness, although I do not like all the answers that he has given. Can he confirm that the same fiscal effect of a 1 per cent. increase in national insurance contribution rates could have been achieved by raising the upper earnings limit to £30,000 a year?

Mr. Scott: I do not have the answer in front of me. If the hon. Gentleman says that is the case, it may be true. I cannot vouch for his research and I am not sure what validity it has for the argument we are making.

I am still very puzzled about Labour party policy. Labour Members make a great deal about the effect of the upper earnings limit as it exists at the moment, but my understanding was that the shadow Chancellor has resiled from the Opposition's position at the last election regarding moving the upper earnings limit, let alone its abolition, which would be totally inappropriate in the light of current circumstances. I do not need to take that point especially seriously.

I do not want to try the patience of the Committee too much, so I shall draw my remarks to a close. In essence, in clause 1 we are making the major provisions for the Bill itself.

I remind the Committee that this is the first increase in the major national insurance contribution rates in 11 years. the two-tier structure for employees which we introduced in 1989 has been more progressive than the system that existed under the previous Government.

The lowest-paid pay a low percentage of their earnings and get considerable benefits in return. Many people will still pay less than they would have had to do under Labour's single percentage scheme. It is an improvement and I commend the clause to the House.

Mr. Ingram: The Minister has been helpful and our exchanges have elaborated many points. We drifted on to many different issues. Additional queries that were raised as a consequence of that will be dealt with in subsequent regulations and, possibly, new Bills.

However, in the light of tonight's debate, I have to ask my hon. Friends to join me in voting against the clause.

Question put, That the clause stand part of the Bill:

NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ALLOCATION

Mr. Dewar: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 1, line 22, leave out subsection (3).

This matter has been discussed at various times during the past few days. I almost said "a few weeks", because it seemed like that at times. It is worth having another quick look at the matter if only to settle fears and establish fact. After all, that is one of the classic purposes and aims of the Committee.

Perhaps this is a plea in irritation rather than mitigation but I was one of the gallant band of brothers which was here at 3 o'clock this morning, together with the Government Whip. He is wearing an exciting tie but I suspect that he will be feeling slightly jaded if, like me, he survived through the long passage of arms over the Ways and Means resolution.

I appear in a somewhat unlikely but not uncharacteristic guise because I suspect that I am on the Government's side in this matter. [Interruption.] It is a matter of some interest because during my time here—it will be 20 years in about two months—I have been engaged in debate, argument and sometimes a spasm panic over retrospective legislation. There are occasions when those who are debating such subjects do not entirely understand the nature of the beast. I include myself because I have no false modesty about these matters.

Earlier, the Minister referred to the retrospective principle and the impact of clause 2. Of course, subsection (3) concentrates on that aspect. My amendment, which I unashamedly say is a probing amendment, also relates to it.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) is here, because if he read in cold blood what I am about to say, he might imagine that it amounted to a criticism of his performance last night. That is not my intention. I think that my hon. Friend's display was spirited. As I moved through the Lobby just before 3 am I heard it described by a senior Conservative as a bravura performance. I have some sympathy with that view.

I am not sure that my hon. Friend's contribution was entirely in touch with the realities of the situation. We were greatly entertained—I hope that my hon. Friend does not object to that term—by the speculations about where that £4·6 billion had disappeared from. It certainly appeared as though a great disappearing act had been performed, because that £4·6 billion had disappeared from the books and was about to be recovered by some form of additional taxation heaped upon today's generation to pay for the mistakes of the past.

At other times in the debate we were led to believe that it was treasure trove, which might still be buried at the back of a filing cabinet at Richmond house. We listened to some splendid arcane arguments about how that money could be distributed for the greater good of humanity, in particular the people of Bradford, South.

I look forward to the rational, tidy explanation from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, because he always displays such characteristics on such small, unimportant matters. If I were to take a barrack-room lawyer's view of the matter—on occasions I have been unfairly accused of such behaviour——

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): No, never.

Mr. Dewar: Right on cue. Thank you.

It is possible to argue for the purpose of the debate that retrospective legislation concerns a rather more serious issue than that suggested last night. It is not designed just to put right a slip of the draftsman, which provided an unlikely legal basis for the proper conduct of affairs and which was not challenged. Retrospective legislation, of its nature, introduces a legal provision that is intended to relieve someone for acts which were clearly not proper and which might even have been outwith the law or ultra vires the capacity of the person concerned. Perhaps even more worryingly, retrospective legislation may replace money that has been misappropriated, misspent or otherwise wasted.

That did not happen in this case and that is why I think that the amazing and cheerful chase that took place in the small hours of this morning, in which some effective points were raised about the general conduct of the Government's business and their policy on the health service, may have been marginally wide of the mark.

I say that with considerable hesitation and I am aware of the fact that I may give unintentional offence. That should not be so because the debate was a useful exercise. It achieved almost all the aims that my hon. Friends for Bradford, South and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), as well as that small group of frondeurs and skirmishers who joined them, had in mind when they set out on the exercise.

My impression—I am sure that the Minister will rise to confirm, deny or explain it—is that there was a unanimity of view about how the formula governing the money which is collected in the national insurance contributions kitty should have operated. That formula resulted in an annual allocation to the national health service.

I know that I should have the relevant figures in the back of my mind. I feel guilty about setting out on the debate without having done the necessary in-depth research. If I remember rightly, only about 14 per cent. of NHS expenditure comes from the national insurance fund, the rest comes from general taxation. It is rather like the poll tax, if you will allow me one sentence on it, Mr. Lofthouse, and the figures that expressed it as a percentage of total local government expenditure. It was always a remarkably small percentage, at between 11 and 12 per cent., because the rest of the money, certainly in England, was provided through, I believe, the standard spending assessment. We have a different system north of the border and my hesitation about that term is due to the fact that I am a little rusty on the exact terminology.

9.30 pm

As I understand it, the 14 per cent. over the years has been properly allocated. I use the words in a lay sense, as everyone thought that it should have been allocated and no one would have thought that anything untoward would have happened if it had not been found out in some recess of Richmond house by some fiendishly ingenious draftsman. Perhaps it was the personal work of the Minister. Perhaps he will tell us? Perhaps, as the new broom at Richmond house, who has his own form of careful craftsmanship, he came across the fault. The Minister can explain that.

Anyway, someone found that ambiguity, as the Minister of State referred to it, which may at some future date have allowed someone of a malevolent disposition to challenge the propriety of the legal basis on which the acceptably proper allocation took place. The Minister was only making clear that that ambiguity cannot be traded on at some future date and cannot cause upset or disorder in the affairs of the national health service. That is not retrospective in the full sense of the word or retrospective in the sense in which we would normally want to look, to use a fine Scottish word, sidyways at the provision.

Therefore, tentatively at this stage, I am not mindful to force the matter to a Division or to unnecessarily prolong the debate, but I am prepared to listen to other hon. Members speak on the matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South may want to argue the toss.

Mr. Cryer: I am looking forward to what the Minister will say, because, although he was subjected to a number of extensive questions last night, the Government Whip intervened and prevented the Minister from replying.

Mr. Dewar: I am sorry to hear that. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. At that stage, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was just warming up nicely and in his 56th minute and, in my untutored view—I do not want to challenge the Chair—he was in order for at least 90 seconds of that time. Under those circumstances, someone was thoughtless and unkind enough to move a closure motion and we heard no more. However, that deprived us of the scholarly and textual analysis of the clause that I am sure that the Minister would have provided.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South is, on occasions, a much misunderstood man. He is showing typical common sense in saying that he should not rush in to pick a fight or to argue the toss on that matter until he has heard the official explanation. I am sure that I have interpreted it correctly and that my hon. Friend's stance implies that if he is not satisfied with the Minister's reply, he can return to the issue with renewed force and authority, having inspected the wares that the Minister is about to lay before the Committee. It is common sense and my hon. Friend's attitude is admirable. It would ill become me to stand between the Committee and what the Minister has to say because, if the Minister's comments are useful to my hon. Friend, almost certainly, they will be useful to me.

On that basis of friendliness and the kind of constructive spirit in which Committees of the whole House ought to be conducted, I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

Mr. Hague: I am delighted to have an opportunity to respond to the points made by the hon. Members for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), and by their colleagues during the unfinished debate on the Ways and Means motion last night. Much alarm was expressed about the matter in our earlier debate. The hypothesis advanced by the hon. Member for Garscadden about what has happened was much nearer to the truth than was some of the alarm expressed last night.

I stress at the outset that no money has been borrowed and that nobody has been ripped off, as was suggested last night. No money has been lost, and no money has been spent that has not been accounted for properly. No money has been spent in any way other than the way in which Parliament intended it to be spent. No money has been misplaced. There is no scandal of the kind about which some hon. Members wondered.

In answer to one of the first questions asked by the hon. Member for Bradford, South last night, there is no retrospective charge on anyone who pays into the national insurance fund. The provision has no implications for the payments that people have made or will make. It makes no difference to any individual; it is simply a matter of ensuring that the legal cover for payments made out of the national insurance fund to the national health service is correct and in order for the future and for the past few years.

Clause 2 deals with the ambiguity, as my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People accurately described it, that has been uncovered in the amending provisions of the Social Security Act 1989 concerning the allocation paid out of national insurance contributions to the national health service. As the Committee knows, the allocation to the national health service is a long-standing provision. The hon. Member for Garscadden was approximately correct in his thoughts about the percentage of national health service funding that is paid for through this route.

Many people traditionally associate treatment under the health service with having paid contributions, even though treatment is in no way dependent on a contribution condition. The 1989 Act altered the structure of national insurance contributions for employees, which is what led to the mistake in the first place. The Act introduced for the first time the concept of an initial percentage and a main percentage. The former would apply to earnings up to the lower earnings limit, and the latter to earnings above that level. I think that I am carrying the Committee with me so far.

Before the 1989 Act, there was a single percentage of 5 per cent., 7 per cent. or 9 per cent. applicable to each level of earnings, and the NHS allocation was a set proportion of that percentage. However, with the 1989 Act, the initial percentage became just 2 per cent.

It was generally agreed in the House and elsewhere that, because the figure was so low, the national health service allocation should apply only to the higher range of earnings on which contributions were paid—that is, between the lower earnings limit and the upper earnings limit—[Interruption.] There is a bit of disruption by my colleagues from the Whips Office. Typically, that rate was 9 per cent.

I am sure that we can all see what the logic was at the time, and I am sure that we continue to agree with it. Given that the allocation to the national health service was 1·05 per cent.—more than half the value of the 2 per cent. initial rate—there was little point in dividing the 2 per cent. in that way. It was believed that contributions to the national health service would instead come out of the payments between the lower earnings limit and the upper earnings limit.

The amendment to the previous legislation by the 1989 Act sought to achieve that intention, but it did so by distinguishing the contributions on which the allocation was payable by referring to them as contributions paid at the main primary percentage rate.

I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Member for Garscadden. It was a diligent official, rather than the new ministerial broom at Richmond house, who first recognised that, because the statutory definition of the main primary percentage rate was in terms of contributions payable at 9 per cent.—10 per cent. from next April as a consequence of the Bill—it was possible to construe the legislation so that an allocation to the health service was not payable where the main contributions were at a rate that was a variation of the 9 per cent. rate. For example, people in their firm's occupational pension scheme pay the lower contracted-out rate of contributions, which is currently 7·2 per cent., or will be 8·2 per cent.

There is ambiguity about whether those contributions, which, of course, are quite a large part of the total, were properly covered by the 1989 Act. Clearly, that would be quite contrary to the long-standing tradition of the health service allocation, and contrary to what the Government and Parliament intended. It could not possibly have been intended at the time. That is why the simple amendment before the Committee aims to place the matter beyond doubt with retrospective effect.

As I mentioned on Second Reading, I share the scepticism and reluctance to which hon. Members have referred about retrospective legislation, but here we have an instance of not trying to change the policy's intention. We are not trying to change anything that has been done over the intervening years. We are removing any ambiguity about the legal cover, so that payments can be —and have been—properly made out of the national insurance fund to the NHS.

I hope that that is a relatively clear explanation, and that it answers the points that hon. Members have raised. In the light of that, I hope that the hon. Member for Garscadden will feel free not to press his amendment.

Mr. Cryer: It is worth commenting that the explanation from the Minister is perfectly understandable, but it demonstrates the dangers that face the House when we hand over to Ministers the powers to make delegated legislation. By a quirk, the requirement for this change is by primary legislation. There are some parts of delegated legislation that are not subject to any further parliamentary procedure. Over the years, this quite significant error was not detected when the legislation went through its Committee stage, or at Second or Third reading. Now that the Government have come to amend it, the faulty interpretation has been discovered.

It behoves us all to ensure that legislation is examined as scrupulously and tightly as possible. It is a reflection on the Government that they are putting this Bill through the House rapidly, and other bits of legislation from time to time under a guillotine. It has not happened on this occasion, but there is always the danger that, if legislation is examined under pressure and in haste, that sort of dangerous fault can develop.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The hon. Gentleman is making a point about Second Reading. He should be speaking directly to the specific amendment.

Mr. Cryer: I am just coming to that, Mr. Morris.

There is a danger that, if we do not table amendments that are sympathetically treated by the Government, such as the amendment before us, they will push legislation through and incorporate the sort of errors that have been discovered on this occasion. It is a lesson for us all that we must be as zealous as we can in ensuring that legislation is as clear and free from interpretation, particularly where, unlike this, challenge can be made through the courts, because, if legislation goes from this place that is open to challenge in the courts, it means that we have all failed.

Mr. Dewar: I take seriously your strictures about wandering, Mr. Morris. It might help you if I said—I can speak only for myself—that I do not intend to delay the Committee on clause stand part. The debate on the proposed removal of subsection 3 will allow me to say all I want to say on the matter.

I am disappointed that the Minister did not find the error himself. I have watched him for only a short period, but he always strikes me as keen. When I was a boy, I was a great enthusiast of the novels of P. G. Wodehouse, in which there was a character called "the Efficient Baxter". He was an extraordinarily diligent secretarial figure, who went around making a perfect pest of himself by discovering things and pointing out the errors of other people's ways. The Efficient Baxter had rimless spectacles that gleamed even when the sun was not shining.

The Under-Secretary has not got that way yet, although his forehead is not a bad substitute. I hoped that he would have performed an Efficient Baxter-like task and discovered a lacuna in the legislative cover for the activities of his Department that had gone undetected for a long time. We must live with that disappointment, and I am prepared to do so, but I hope that the Minister does better next time.

9.45 pm

I followed most of what the Minister said, and I am prepared to accept his explanation. This is a highly technical subject. In my early days in the job, I used to sit and listen to people talking about LELs and UELs, using all the jargon and shorthand of the national insurance contribution world. It took me a long time to understand what all that meant. For a while, I thought that they were referring to American colleges or football teams. It was only after a while that the truth dawned.

The Minister has allayed my reasonable fears, and perhaps even my unreasonable fears, and it may be only that the de minimis rule has gone slightly wrong. I am happy that is should be put right in this way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer has done us a service. I hope that he will not be hurt when I say that there are occasions, coming late through the corridors when I have heard Members, usually Conservative Members, saying uncharitable things about my hon. Friend. [HON. MEMBERS: "Never!"] I am afraid that it is true. It is usually because he has had the courage and tenacity to stand up to speak in a debate on a Ways and Means resolution or a money resolution, to ventilate something that has caught his fancy and his attention. He is not normally closely associated with me in Labour party terms.

The Chairman: Order. I have great difficulty in relating what the hon. Gentleman is saying to amendment No. 4, but perhaps it will become clear.

Mr. Dewar: I am happy to say that it may not become clearer, because it is about to stop. I was, in passing, making the point that an outsider would say that my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South and I illustrate the rich diversity of opinion that co-exists happily within the Labour party. I admire his work as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, and he is right—even comparatively technical matters such as this should be properly challenged and scrutinised. I know that, in dark and secret places, he spends hours carrying out that task, and we are grateful for that.

Although we have discovered nothing of great moment in this exercise, it is right that the Minister should be forced to explain matters and, where we see the appearance of a retrospective provision, due explanation should be given. In this case, due explanation has been given. I rest content and beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 4

CORRESPONDING PROVISION FOR NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr. Dewar: Will the Minister say something about the clause? The week has been dominated by Irish affairs of one sort or another, and we have here the corresponding provision for Northern Ireland. I should like to know how the machinery will work. I say that rather apologetically, because I understand that there is a different system over there—one that reflects the tensions, difficulties, frustrations and worries of the political and physical situation there.

I recognise, for example, that many statutory foundations must be laid here which do not have to be laid for Northern Ireland affairs. Obviously, the Order in Council is the instrument that governs in this matter. It would be interesting for the Committee if the Minister could explain just for a minute—I do not invite a learned paper on this—how this will operate in Northern Ireland, what the safeguards are and what the legislative foundation is on which the officials will work in gathering and administering this particular increase in national insurance contributions.

You may remember, Mr. Morris, because you may have been in the Chamber for at least part of these proceedings, that there was no need for a money resolution for Northern Ireland. I asked what happened in Northern Ireland and was told, slightly dismissively, that such a resolution was not necessary. Now is the chance to discover why and how the difference exists and operates.

Mr. Hague: I can give a brief explanation which will set the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest and clarify the matter.

Clause 4 provides that a corresponding Order in Council under the Northern Ireland Act 1974 will be subject to the negative rather than the positive resolution procedure. Hon. Members who take an interest in Northern Ireland legislation will be familiar with this provision. It simply gives advance warning in the Bill that corresponding provisions will be anacted in Northern Ireland.

It is designed to ensure immediate parity for people there with the arrangements that will apply in the rest of the United Kingdom. The purpose of the clause is to make it clear to Northern Ireland Members that they can take part in the debate on the Bill's substantive provisions in the knowledge that any change made to its substance will be made later in parallel Northern Ireland legislation.

It is worth noting that clause 4 does not apply to clause 3, as clause 3 deals specifically with amendments to the corresponding legislation for the Province. Clause 4 applies to the rest of the Bill, which does not deal specifically with Northern Ireland. I hope that that has clarified the matter for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dewar: We are privileged. Not only has the junior Minister mastered his brief on this, but we have present the Minister of State who is long conversant with Irish affairs and no doubt can help us out.

As I understand the Minister's explanation, he is saying that this is a trigger. It flags up to any Irish Member that he can wholeheartedly take part in our debates, knowing that there will be some form of legislation put in place by Order in Council. I presume that that procedure does not involve the elected representatives directly or any form of debate or discussion, at least in the public forum. Therefore, Northern Ireland Members can come along and share in the excitement of our deliberations in the certain knowledge that what is decided will then be reflected.

I do not know what the Council of the Order in Council is. I presume that it is the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland—one Privy Councillor, rather than Privy Councillors, which is one what usually thinks of. I presume that it is not a body with a set membership that meets round a great table like the great Council of the North in the 15th century, sending riders out in all directions with the glad tidings of what the great men had decided. In any event, I think that I understand the point.

One subsidiary question is of interest. At one point I set out to draft a series of amendments—they may be on the amendment paper—which were intended to turn this from a negative to an affirmative procedure. It was pointed out to me by various people who are much more expert than I that that was not necessary, because I was merely returning the law to the state in which it was. Therefore, the whole matter was redundant. But is there some sort of change in the procedure in Northern Ireland that reflects short-term problems and which means that certain matters do not apply? Is the negative procedure a result of that? I did not quite follow that point. I know that the Minister will have followed my halting attempts at an explanation and will be able to come up with a clear exposition of the situation, to which I look forward.

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman is correct and we are now at one in our interpretation of the clause. It is a good description to say that the clause is a flagging-up for Northern Ireland Members. It means that they can participate in deliberations on the matter knowing that it will be reflected in Northern Ireland legislation, despite the fact that most of the rest of the Bill does not specificially refer to Northern Ireland. I am not aware of any special circumstances that have led to any change in procedure, but if there are any I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and make that clear.

Mr. Dewar: I do not want to turn this into a dialogue. That seems inappropriate in the Chamber. One would feel more at home in Standing Committee in such an exchange.

Clause 4 says:

> "An Order in Council . . . which states that it is made only for purposes corresponding to those of section 1 or 2 of this Act—

[Mr. Dewar]

> (a) shall not be subject to paragraph 1(4) and (5) of that Schedule . . . but
> (b) shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution by either House of Parliament.

I presume that that means that if we were not specifically excluding paragraph 1(4) and (5) of the schedule, which the rubric in brackets helpfully tells us is an affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament, the Order in Council would be subject to an affirmative resolution. Therefore, the fact that we are taking that out must be for some special purpose and reason. In other words, in making the Order in Council subject to a negative resolution, we are upsetting the norm. We are rebutting the presumption of what would normally happen in terms of paragraph 1(4) and (5) of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 1974. What I am trying to get at is why we are upsetting the norm here.

It is as clear as the nose on my face that the Order in Council would usually be subject to an affirmative resolution. We are rebutting that and making it subject to a negative resolution, and the simple question is why.

Mr. Hague: The best way to explain this to the hon. Gentleman is to say that there is no benefit in making the Order in Council subject to affirmative resolution. Doing so would provide a separate opportunity for Members of Parliament to debate the application of the changes to Northern Ireland, but all those changes can be debated during the passage of the Bill.

Therefore, although it would provide an opportunity for an additional debate as it specifically relates to Northern Ireland, using the negative resolution procedure is perfectly in order on this occasion because Northern Ireland Members have had the opportunity to participate in this debate. As it happens, they are not here and have not participated, but had they wished to do so, they could have used this opportunity rather than the opportunity that would have been given by the passage of an affirmative resolution through the House.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Listeners to the exchanges might have been foxed. Does the Minister agree that, in effect, he is denying Northern Ireland Members the opportunity to debate the matter on an affirmative resolution? If I am wrong, please tell me. In respect of legislation for Yorkshire, it would be perfectly possible, would it not, for the hon. Gentleman or any other Member from Yorkshire to participate on the Bill, but if there was no opportunity to participate on an affirmative resolution when it applied to Yorkshire, they would be denied the opportunity?

Mr. Hague: They would be denied the opportunity of participating in a debate on an affirmative resolution, but not denied the opportunity of participating in debates during the passage of the Bill. Therefore, Northern Ireland Members will have had the same opportunity as all hon. Members to participate in the debate. As it happens, they have chosen not to do so but the same legislation applies to them. The effect of the Bill is the same for them as for the rest of the United Kingdom and the effect of this part of the clause is merely that the debate is concentrated on the passage of the Bill, rather than requiring further affirmative resolutions, confirming what we would have dealt with already during the Bill's passage.

Mr. Dewar: I think that I should bale out of this discussion while the going is good. I may be tempted to tell the Minister that there is an obvious follow-up question, to which he will already have turned his mind. If he is saying that there is no point in having an affirmative resolution procedure because, ultimately, the debate is in the Chamber and Northern Ireland Members have a right to participate in it, I cannot understand why the normal powers under schedule 1 to the 1974 Act envisage that there should be an affirmative resolution. We are now upsetting and removing that provision and substituting an unusual set of circumstances—a negative resolution.

May I put the matter simply? I promise that this is my last effort. In what circumstances would schedule 1 and the affirmative resolution apply and not be withdrawn by the legislative drafting that we are now considering?

Mr. Hague: The circumstances in which that would not be done would be if there were no risk of the affirmative resolution and passage of the Bill being so separate in time that there was no parity between the different parts of the United Kingdom. Because the measure is designed to take effect in April 1994, the time in which an affirmative resolution could be considered, which would introduce the changes in Northern Ireland at the same time as in the rest of the United Kingdom, would be very limited. To avoid the risk of the measure being implemented at different times in different parts of the same country, the procedure is adopted in this case.

Question put and agreed to.

New clause 1

ANNUAL REPORT TO PARLIAMENT

> "The Secretary of State shall publish on an annual basis a report to Parliament setting out the yield from the increase in primary Class 1 contributions payable as a consequence of the provisions of section 1 of this Act."—[Mr. Dewar.]

Brought up and read the First time.

Mr. Dewar: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

We have had a passage of arms over some minor textual matters and the constitutional machinery of another part of the United Kingdom. In sharp contrast, we now move to new clause 1, which is general in its impact and raises some fairly broad issues. I therefore intend to deal with it in a broad way but hope that I shall not stray or test your patience, Mr. Morris.

I do not intend to rehearse my objections to the main thrust of the Bill or to clause 1. I shall not talk in such detail about our reservations and fears about the substantial increase in taxation represented by the hike from 9 per cent. to 10 per cent. However, what has undoubtedly arisen during these exchanges is evidence that there is a good deal of confusion and no meeting of minds either between the Labour party and the Conservative party or between those parties and the Liberal Democrats. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) takes an individual view, as does his party. In some cases it is an impractical view, but it is always interesting.

On no part of the Bill will there be a more important debate in the period that lies ahead. We need not go into the merits of the new clause, but we can all agree on one matter —that many question marks exist over the traditional way in which we deliver our services and over the proper weight that should be given to the contractual principle between the Government and governed and the extent to which people are buying entitlement when they make national insurance contributions.

There are people—I am not one of them—who have put big question marks over the whole idea of the contributory principle, suggesting that national insurance should just be a form of taxation, perhaps hypothecated, but still taxation. Others go further and suggest that we get rid——

Dame Elaine Kellet-Bowman (Lancaster): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Labour party under the late Lord Attlee made a grave error by not funding the scheme when it was brought in? All our problems have stemmed from that. It is an in-and-out scheme, whereas it should have been funded, as others are.

Mr. Dewar: I understand what the hon. Lady says. I was at a conference recently where a very elderly person told me what Jim Griffiths had told her. About 20 minutes later I lost the thread of the story, but it was some sort of explanation of why the scheme was not funded at that time. Perhaps in a few years' time the hon. Lady herself will be telling people similar stories.

In any event, whether or not the scheme should have been funded, it [illegible] not funded. I believe that there is some virtue in dealing with the realities of the world in which we live, and I commend that approach to the hon. Lady.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is it not rather odd that the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) has withheld this crucial piece of information for so long? Perhaps she should have revealed it long ago so that we could have laid the blame at the door of poor old Clem Attlee.

Mr. Dewar: Well——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: My remarks arose precisely out of the observation that the hon. Member for Garscadden was making.

Mr. Dewar: I must get on. The tragedy is that, although I know Jim Griffiths said something, I do not know what it was. It must therefore remain a mystery.

My point is that important arguments are developing, some of them so fundamental as to question the whole principle of the contributory system. Perhaps it is apt to point that out in the week in which Sir Peter Barclay retires from his post as chairman of the Social Security Advisory Committee. He made a speech not long ago in which he directly suggested scrapping the whole system—the Contributions Agency and the recording of contributions—and treating national insurance as a form of taxation, whereupon we could get on with life.

There are fundamental difficulties with this approach. I do not endorse it for one second; I just make the point that these major arguments are beginning to develop. Perhaps in a strange way I should pay tribute to some of the more unpleasant theories emerging from the Department of Social Security. They have certainly widened the argument and drawn new people into an area that used to preoccupy specialists alone.

My impression is that more and more people who are not experts or professionals, and who are not involved directly, are becoming uncomfortably aware of the importance of these arguments and want to know more about them.

There is a real difficulty with what one might term the dissemination of information. There is also some difficulty about a debate that is often conducted under the guise of calm and rational discussion but which is actually highly polemical. We have to rely a great deal on the Government for much of the information. The word "Government" is reassuring in one way. It suggests impartiality—information provided by pure distillation from theory and from fact. The truth, as we know, is the very opposite. Government information is often highly tendentious; and the Government's approach is often merely presentational.

At the moment the Government are attempting—wrongly in my view, but I am parti pris in the argument—to suggest that the financial difficulties of the social security and contributory systems are much worse than they are. There are long-term trends which are of concern, and I do not deny that they must be dealt with and catered for in any future plans.

I will draw the Social Security Advisory Committee into the argument again, because that point was made in its ninth annual report which was published this week. It does not take the view, and nor do I, that we are in such a crisis that we are teetering on the edge of an abyss and that we have to send in the demolition men and the broker's men, or the system will implode or explode.

Mr. Corbyn: Has my hon. Friend had time to read the pamphlet from the No Turning Back group on the future of the pension system and the welfare state? That pamphlet seems to give the true version of the Government's intentions, which are to reduce consistently the value of the state old-age pension and to boost the private pension industry at the expense of the state scheme. The state scheme inevitably can provide for everybody, whereas private schemes can provide only for those who can afford to pay into them during their working lives.

Mr. Dewar: I was talking about the Government's information and expressing doubts about some of their presentational factors. To take me then to the No Turning Back group is a little unfair—that is a rather different kettle of fish.

I agree with my hon. Friend that is a pernicious pamphlet and, if he wants to collect such things, he should read the recent pamphlet from Dr. Madson Pirie. My hon. Friend may consider Dr. Pirie's remarks on private pension schemes and their virtues in the light of recent news from the Securities and Investment Board, the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation and the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Organisation. However, that is a different issue.

Mr. Hague indicated assent.

Mr. Dewar: I see that the Minister agrees with me on that. We want to try to get impartiality into the debate, and a basis of information on which we can conduct the argument. I will not trespass on it at the moment, but new clause 4 tackles the same problem. We are asking the Government to enters lists in a more public sense and to provide information and assistance.

I will give a brief example which has occurred to me, concerning an issue on which I have written to the Minister. He may have the letter on the desk at moment.

[Mr. Dewar]

There is a complex and difficult argument, as the House knows, about retirement ages and the state retirement scheme. One of the factors which influence that deeply is the demographic factor and the projection of the number of people above the retirement age.

All hon. Members have their little conglomerations of facts which they can trip out in an argument and which become user-friendly. One of my facts is that, in the year 2030, there will be 14·1 million people over pensionable age in this country. I got that figure from a Government publication and it was an authoritative figure, which was used both in the text and in the graphs. The figure was used for a long time in the consultative document for discussion on the equalisation of the pension age. The Leader of the House will be familiar with the figure.

Two months ago, I was at a conference that was organised by Legal and General at which the Secretary of State spoke. Rather to my surprise, the right hon. Gentleman suddenly said during his speech that we would have great problems with demographic trends because in the year 2030—the very year to which I have referred—there will be 15·5 million people over retirement age in this country. The statistic appears to be the same, but—I do not want to use a pejorative term and say that it was invented—suddenly almost 1·5 million people were introduced into the argument.

Clearly that is a major change, and a factor which must be taken into account. I am not being funny about this, and I genuinely do not know why that happened. I can tell the House that I have watched carefully, and 15·5 million is now established in the Government's little group of statistics. The Prime Minister uses that figure constantly, for example, as does the Secretary of State.

I have written to the Minister and I wait with interest to ask how that had happened, and on what basis the Government suddenly found another 1·5 million pensioners. The hon. Member for Lancaster will appreciate this because she takes a great interest in these matters, and I acknowledge that she is a frequent attender of debates such as these. In 2030, the harmonisation of the pension age at 65 will have taken place, if the Government's plans come to fruition. We would have expected that, because they want to cut the number of people over pensionable age.

Not only have we an increase of 1·5 million people, but in circumstances which have changed since the original estimate and which one would have expected to have lowered the estimate and not increased it. It is mysterious and interesting; that is why I am interested in impartial reports and bringing some objectivity into the debate and the facts on which it is based.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): Is it not the case that, in crude terms, the Government are trying to soften up opinion to justify cuts in pension provision and other welfare benefits? They are grossly exaggerating the problems that Britain and other countries face. That is why we see such a slapdash and casual acquaintance with the facts.

Mr. Dewar: I have a great deal of sympathy with that view. It will be widely shared among Opposition Members, but I have no doubt that it will be strongly repudiated by the Government.

10.15 pm

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dewar: In a moment.

It may depend on whether the Chief Secretary or the Chancellor wins the battle of the Treasury, whether it is a real battle or a presentational exercise. Perhaps it is another aspect of the matter into which I shall not delve.

The new clauses address the need to establish a proper basis for the discussion.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: If there are mysteries here, there must be mysteries in all the other countries in Europe. As the hon. Gentleman no doubt knows, the German Government said exactly the same thing in their submission to Mr. Delors—that the pension burden in Germany will be enormous. It is the same in France, Sweden, Norway and Denmark. We are not the only ones who are discovering a demographic time bomb.

Mr. Dewar: I understand that entirely. The hon. Lady has heard Ministers saying it on many occasions. The term demographic time bomb is, in a sense, hyperbole. If she looks at the facts and figures, she will see that we are infinitely better placed that most western European countries.

The country in the greatest mess in demographic terms, for historic reasons, is Germany. The position there is extremely serious and Chancellor Kohl has been taking energetic steps to get to grips with it. It is a problem on a different scale from the one that we face in Britain.

The hon. Lady may be a victim of the hype that I am trying to get over. I suspect she has been listening to Ministers. I do not blame her; it is how Back Benchers operate, but she is over-simplifying the idea that we cannot survive because we have a problem on the same scale as that of Germany.

I can recommend to the hon. Lady—if she wishes, I shall arrange for a copy to be sent to her—an excellent and substantial piece of research from John Hill of the London School of Economics, which deals with social security expenditure which she will find genuinely interesting. She could then measure it against some of the statements from Government. But I must not argue the case.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, as we are spending an increasing amount of money on our national health service and cures are being found which would have been unthinkable even two or three years ago, not only will the number of people living increase, but their quality of life will improve? It means people are not only living on to a much greater age, but they actually enjoy living on to a much greater age.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Lady is happy. I agree with her entirely.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: I shall live to be 100.

Mr. Dewar: Do not depress me.

The hon. Lady makes an important point and I agree with her. it is a complicated equation. It is true that we are closing acute beds, sometimes over-enthusiastically, but in some cases for good reasons, as surgery can be carried out in an out-patient department which once would have required extensive in-patient treatment.

I remember being in hospital for five weeks for something that my doctors now tell me would be done on an out-patient basis. It is a complicated equation.

Let me make one more point to the hon. Lady. The interesting document produced by the Government, "The growth in social security: International comparisons", with which some of my hon. Friends will be familiar, contains evidence of the expense and burden that we will have to carry and, as a civilised community, ought to carry. It is also important to remember that, if we take social protection expenditure—that is, the health service and the benefit system put crudely altogether—as a percentage of gross domestic product, in Europe the burden is 26 per cent. and in Britain it is 23 per cent. We are well below the European Union average.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: We must be more efficient.

Mr. Dewar: We may be more efficient, but Ministers often lead us to believe that we are uniquely at risk because of ever-escalating costs, which cannot be controlled and are now running away in a disastrous fashion.

The contributory principle—the inter-relationship between the national insurance fund, the national health service, the benefits and pensions systems—is a key area. There is a genuine case for an annual report on the kind of increase which has been included in the Bill. If we can receive that kind of impartial information, we will have a better chance—perhaps not a great chance—of a well-informed debate and of reaching the right conclusions at the end of the day, even if we start from a different political point of view.

There was a time when at least we had common aims and objectives—even though we argued about the way in which they could be achieved. One of the sadnesses of recent years is that we can no longer agree on the aims and objectives and the proper community approach. If we are to have an argument of such far-reaching importance, we deserve to be better served by the Government's statistics.

Mr. Wicks: I rise with great enthusiasm to support the proposal that we should have an annual report on these very complex matters. The debates on Second Reading and in Committee have shown that we are at something of a crossroads; there are different scenarios about the future of social insurance or some alternative to it.

I was intrigued by the intervention of the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) when she sought to blame Lord Attlee for not supporting a funding scheme. Tha allows me to say, with something of an exaggerated flourish, that I knew Clement Attlee. I refer to a short conversation that I had with him when I was a schoolboy. The conversation with the then Lord Attlee, in county hall, London—in the good old days when we had a London county council, a council that my father had the honour of chairing in its final year—went something like this: I said, "Hello, sir." He said, "How are you, young man?" "Fine, sir," I replied. I regret that I did not seize the opportunity, in the middle of this historic dialogue, to say, "What about funding, Lord Attlee?"—but next time I will.

The serious point is that there are different scenarios about the future of national insurance, or social insurance or some alternative. An annual report would enable us to monitor performance against objectives. It could become as important as the annual reports from the Supplementary Benefits Commission, as it was, and more recently the Social Security Advisory Committee. Many Opposition Members will pay tribute to the work of Sir Peter Barclay, whose tenure as chairman of that committee comes to an end at the end of the month. I have great respect for his work; his reports have helped enormously and have added strength to the proposal made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). I believe that annual reports could become important state documents.

One scenario is that we will increasingly see a reduction in the principle of national insurance and a move towards a kind of residual social welfare system. That would come about through a reduction in the value of national insurance benefits, a move from state provision to occupational welfare—we have seen an example of that recently. It would come about also through the privatisation of what were formerly national insurance benefits—we have seen that with private pensions.

I would have major worries about that. To "residualise" welfare and guard it carefully with a means test is to increase the inequalities in our society—albeit at a time when new language is used to describe state benefits and state provision. Unemployment benefit, for example, has become a "job seeker's allowance". I wonder where it will all end. Perhaps the Government should consider calling the homeless "home owner aspirants", which would be less negative and less politically embarrassing.

Let me give another example of the linguistics of social policy. I offer this purely as an illustration, not as a prediction. If one day a Government anxious about public expenditure were to propose the introduction of euthanasia for the poor, no such crude and vulgar language would be employed. The measure would be introduced under the acronym EHOP—"early heaven opportunity programme". The language of social policy is certainly becoming more intriguing.

The Chairman: Order. I am listening attentively to what the hon. Gentleman is saying——

Mr. Wicks rose——

The Chairman: Will the hon. Gentleman sit down for a second? The new clause is entitled "Annual report to Parliament". Whether the language to which the hon. Gentleman refers will form part of that report is not immediately evident from what he has said so far; perhaps clarity will soon prevail.

Mr. Wicks: Certainly the annual report will be full of language—and, most important, it will help us to enable both public and Parliament to determine the direction in which the national insurance system is going. That is why I support the idea.

An alternative to the idea of a residual welfare system, in which means-testing increasingly replaces national insurance, is the idea of enabling the annual report to identify other possibilities. Some people say, for instance, that the concept of national insurance is no longer relevant in a modern society. They claim that it is not actuarially sound. It is not funded, they say, so why not come clean and make it part of income tax? The annual report would determine whether the system was moving away from national insurance and towards taxation.

Mr. Corbyn: How would the report deal with the position of people who were denied invalidity benefit that they could otherwise have received because of the new rules introduced by the Secretary of State? Would it examine the question of the refusal of benefits under a means-testing system?

Mr. Wicks: I certainly hope that it would. It needs to be independent and objective when assessing the overall impact of such measures.

Among other things, the report would enable us to establish whether national insurance has a future. I believe that it has, but that we need to reinvent or reconstruct the concept of social or national insurance. The issue was discussed on Second Reading. I think that any new social insurance system would have to establish whether, 50 years after Beveridge, the risks faced by modern society were being addressed. If Beveridge were alive today, although he would recognise many of those risks—for instance, the risk of unemployment, job seeking or whatever the language is—he would also recognise that new risks had developed. The annual report would help us to assess them.

Many of the growing number of frail elderly people will need not only an income—a pension—but care. That is one of the major forms of social insecurity nowadays. It is a major risk that insurance should help us to tackle. It may be that in a reconstructed national insurance scheme people could be insured against the risk that one day they may need care costing hundreds of pounds a week, perhaps £20,000 or £30,000 a year, in residential accommodation. A modern national insurance scheme would help us to tackle such risks.

The idea of an annual report to help us to shine a light on the practice and policy of social insurance is a vital part of the Bill. I hope that it will become part of the Bill and that the Committee will accept the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar).

10.30 pm

Mr. Flynn: It is a pleasure to speak on this vital new clause. We must look to the report to Parliament as a sort of gatekeeper—to use the word used by the Minister. It should be seen as a moderating influence, someone to guard the gate. My misgiving about the use of that word is that the Spanish word for gatekeeper is portillo. That may be some sort of sign.

I have attended almost every minute of the debate and I have been slightly distressed to see that the Secretary of State has had trouble keeping his eyes open. Earlier today, I had a conversation with a Treasury Minister who was purchasing mints downstairs. [Interruption.] This is relevant; it will become clear later. I pointed out to the Minister that there was a notice warning customers about an outbreak of some sort of Asiatic plague at the mint factory and that they should not take mints. I worry that he might be sending them to other members of the Government and it may be that the Secretary of State's apparent indisposition——

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. We have gone far enough with that. We must return to the debate on the new clause.

Mr. Flynn: There is clearly a deep division between the policies of the Treasury and those of Ministers in the Department of Social Security. It strikes at the heart of the new clause. The report to Parliament should be seen to be at least an attempt to retain parliamentary scrutiny of the Government's destruction of the welfare state.

The welfare state is not something trivial. It did not happen by accident and was not introduced by just one Parliament. It is the result of the life work of generations of our parents and grandparents. They saw it as a great ideal that society should be organised so as to distribute society's wealth in a way that was fair to everybody. They wanted to ensure that when people reached retirement age they would have about 40 per cent. of their previous salary on which to live out their final days in dignity and relative prosperity. That was the inspiration of Lloyd George and Beveridge and it has had support from all parties until the present day.

There is one question that the Government must answer. Why is it that between 1944 and 1951, when we still had rationing and great troubles and were a poorer nation than we are today—the same applies to the years 1950 to 1955 when we were in a similar position—the value of the pension was greater in real terms than it is now? Also, why are the Government planning for the real value of the pension to be far less in 40 years—when, by all predictions, we will be richer than we are now—than it is now?

I intervened earlier because, as an old lag of these debates—I have sat in on every Social Security Bill since 1987—I was distressed by the fact that none of the many knowledgeable Conservative Members with an insight into social security had spoken. We heard at least one speech from a parliamentary private secretary, who was reading from a brief, but we have not heard from the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), for whom I think we all have great respect and whose works I have quoted in the Chamber. The hon. Gentleman understands the situation and has blown the gaff on the Government's great con. They have successfully convinced the media and the nation that we cannot afford a welfare state any more, that somehow a terrible disaster has taken place and that we cannot afford a national insurance scheme. I make the distinction between a national insurance scheme and a poor law scheme because one hon. Member referred——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going very wide of the subject. The debate is about contributions, so he should get back to the clause under discussion.

Mr. Flynn: Each year the annual report must contain a critical appraisal of whether we have a welfare state or return to a poor law scheme. I suggest that the authors of that report should become the social——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I must insist that the hon. Gentleman return to the clause.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: He has never been on it.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The subject of the clause is contributions, so the hon. Gentleman should confine his remarks to that subject.

Mr. Flynn: Contributions are a vital part of the Bill. Earlier, I challenged the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) to tell me how they have changed since 1979. He sought assistance from heaven. Perhaps it is not well known that he is fluent in Icelandic. For all its value, his contribution could well have been delivered in that language. The difference is significant. In 1989, the level of contribution—the precise subject of the clause—was 6·5 per cent. The change to 10 per cent. represents an enormous increase of more than 50 per cent. since then.

Let us puncture the myth that we cannot afford a welfare state. We do not need to increase contributions by 53 per cent. over 14 years, or even by 40 per cent. or 20 per cent. If we increase them by 15 per cent., in the next century we will be able to afford pensions that are more generous than they are today.

Who says so? The hon. Member for Havant. Who else? The Social Security Advisory Committee, the organisation that advises the Government, has produced its ninth report and it should be the organisation that produces future reports. The Government have disregarded every other report by that Committee. Throughout my time in Parliament since 1987, I have read all those reports. They are a great guide to parliamentarians on what has happened to the social security system. The advice of the committee that was set up to be objective and independent has been disregarded time after time.

Judging by their contributions and the policies that they have adopted, the Government are driven not by any considerations of welfare or fairness but by blind ideology. They have used the excuse of demographic change—as the hon. Member for Havant says in his splendid document, "The Age of Entitlement"—not because it is true, because it is not. They have vastly exaggerated.

We will have problems in the next century because of the baby boomers which will last for about 13 years. After that, the problem will lessen and we will have a society in which we can provide decent pensions. The reasoning behind the Government's policy—the whole nonsense behind this legislation—is the ideology that everything private is wonderful and everything public is nonsense.

[Mr. Flynn]

What are our contributions to the national insurance scheme? We will soon be paying 10 per cent.—the highest this century and in history. What will happen to them? If the contributions go into the national insurance scheme, 95 per cent. will end up as benefits. The alternative is to put the contributions into private insurance schemes. When that is done, 50 per cent. will end up being paid as benefits. The other 50 per cent. will be lost in administration charges, profits for the insurance company and commission. That is the time bomb under the Government. That is what contributions are all about.

We have a system of national insurance. Beveridge's inspiration was a scheme based on contributions. What he saw, Mr. Lofthouse, was the insurance schemes that your father and mother and my father and mother had—industrial insurance policies. They paid someone to come to the door every week. Beveridge studied those policies. He said that 50 per cent. of the contributions were lost in the scheme's administration charges. He said that the private insurance companies were more interested in selling the schemes and in their profits than in providing value.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The hon. Gentleman is misquoting Beveridge. Beveridge wanted the scheme to be run in gradually. He did not want it to come in immediately. I see that the hon. Gentleman has only a silly bit of paper; I have the Beveridge report. The point is that Beveridge wanted the scheme to be run in gradually. I observed earlier that if the scheme had been funded, all the problems that we have inherited and that we shall pass on to our grandchildren would not have occurred.

Mr. Flynn: The hon. Lady has quoted Beveridge, which, like my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks), I regard as night-time reading. Beveridge said that he wanted > "to ensure that every person fulfilling during his"— pardon the sexism—

> "working life the obligation of service according to his powers, can claim as of right when he is past work an income adequate enough to maintain him."

Let me tell the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) what Beveridge also concluded. He published his report in 1942. He thoroughly investigated the life assurance schemes. His conclusion was that the cost of administration consumed half the money paid in by members. He said that the door-to-door insurance—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Lancaster wishes to know about Beveridge, she should listen. I am quoting his report. He said that door-to-door insurance served the interests of companies and the sellers of policies to the detriment of those insured. His preferred solution was a state-run scheme for everyone.

We have a state-run scheme that has been neglected. We are not giving people choice. The Government have very unwisely told people to opt out of the state scheme and go into personal pension schemes. All Conservative Members who have a vested interest and a direct pecuniary interest in personal pensions should not vote on the issue. The Government would lose their majority. The result of this——

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to impugn the integrity of Conservative Members during the debate?

The First Deputy Chairman: It is not the tradition of the House, but it is not uncommon that hon. Members on both sides of the House do it.

Mr. Flynn: I have noticed in the Register of Members' Interests that 14 per cent. of Opposition Members have pecuniary interests in various bodies. I have none, I assure you, Mr. Lofthouse. Eighty-five per cent. of Conservative Members have pecuniary interests. I do not impugn the honour of Conservative Members, but I suggest that we should adopt the practice in local government whereby someone who declares an interest in a subject does not vote on it. That is an important reform that we should introduce in the House of Commons, especially [illegible] 85 per cent. of Conservative Members have pecuniary interests.

We want a proper annual report to be made by an objective body such as the Social Security Advisory Committee. The Government are not giving choice to the country by offering them personal pensions. They are throwing people to the wolves.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): For the past hour, I have listened to the debate on this new clause and I have yet to hear one argument in favour of it. The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) talked about a record level of national insurance contributions, which will be the consequence of this Bill. We do not need an annual report to tell us that we are spending a record amount on the national health service and social security. If we examine the Bill and the new clauses, it must be blindingly obvious that if we will the end, we must will the means.

I do not see why we need to spend more money on administration and creating more reports and statistics when we all know the truth. Under this Government, we have spent a record amount on the NHS, and we are spending a record amount on the social security budget. All hon. Members have received letters from constituents saying that people are prepared to pay more to fund the national health service. This Bill will enable people to pay more for a better national health service. We do not need this new clause to ensure that that is carried out.

10.45 pm

Mr. Corbyn: I shall be brief because the Minister should have an opportunity to speak about this excellent new clause. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) explained why the Government will not support the new clause. It is obvious. If there is an objective annual analysis of what happened to the contributions—what was paid out from them, who did not get them and who was denied them by means testing; and the almost 1 million people who received no benefit whatever despite having paid into the fund during their working lives—the Government will be exposed.

The Government are perpetrating an enormous con on the people of this country. They are increasing contributions in order to pay less and reduce benefits. All pensioners have been robbed of £18 a week because of the break of the link with earnings in 1980 and the substitution of a cockeyed retail prices index. The Government are being cruel and hypocritical by cutting unemployment benefit, despite the scheme being a contributory one. It is benefit fraud of the highest order. That is what benefit fraud is about. It is not the sort of xenophobic nonsense that the Secretary of State was talking about when he addressed the annual rally of the Conservative party. Of course, to call it a conference would be to suggest that there was a serious discussion going on, which there certainly was not.

An annual report must show the real cost of the state pension scheme and the contributory system. My hon. Friend explained what happened under the old private insurance schemes which predated the welfare state. We are rapidly moving back to a society in which any spiv can set up a pension company, make a great deal of money from it and possibly go bust. The robbery of Maxwell pensioners has exposed the lack of regulations for pension funds. People who are withdrawing from the state earnings-related pension scheme are a £6 billion drain on the national insurance fund. I believe that such matters must be exposed.

The Government rely on secrecy. They rely on the Murdoch press to perpetrate the enormous lie and myth that this country cannot afford a universal benefit scheme or a proper welfare state. We can afford it if the political will is there to do it. The Government's changes to the taxation system over the past 15 years have rewarded the rich with £31 billion per year. That is what it is about. The Bill is simply a minor, introductory skirmish into the great row and debate that will take place about the Government's attempt to smash the welfare state in which we believe so strongly and passionately.

Mr. Hague: This has been a varied debate. You would be angry with me, Mr. Lofthouse, however, if I failed to confine my remarks to the new clause and followed hon. Members down the various alleyways and byways that they have travelled.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) proposed the new clause in the spirit of providing impartial information to the country and Parliament and in the spirit of openness in policy making. I agree with that spirit. It is not a bad idea to have an annual report to Parliament about the national insurance fund. In fact, it is such a good idea that we already do it every February when we lay the re-rating or uprating orders for national insurance contributions. That provides a great deal of information.

The new clause would require the Secretary of State to publish every year an additional report, which would set out the expected income from the contributions paid by employees, in a form that showed separately the income attributable to the proposed increase in the rates of the contributions from 9 to 10 per cent. I see little point in producing such an additional report, which would be confined to one financial impact on the national insurance fund, when the Government Actuary already produces a report, which must be laid with the annual orders that set the rates of contributions and benefits for the coming year. Each year those reports give details of expected contribution income and expected contributory benefit expenditure. They also take into account the effect of any changes that have taken place in the rates or accounts of contributions.

I do not think that there would be much merit in having an additional report. Hon. Members who have argued for more information should be aware that a quinquennial review of the national insurance fund is——

Sir Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): Every five years.

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend has immediately worked out that it is conducted every five years.

That review contains the Government Actuary's long-term financial estimates, which consider the viability of the contributory scheme up to 60 years hence. Opposition Members have rightly said that they want to take a long-term view of the scheme and that review offers that opportunity.

It would be wrong to initiate an additional report. I do not believe in creating unnecessary work for civil servants, who would be called on to provide information that is already ascertainable and available from the reports provided by the Government Actuary. I hope that the new clause is either withdrawn, or defeated in a Division.

Mr. Dewar: I listened with interest, but without much hope, to the Minister. The new clause is a good one and there are powerful arguments for it, despite his best efforts. I am unrepentant about tabling it.

Mr. Hague: What does the hon. Gentleman think about my point about the quinquennial review?

Mr. Dewar: I always find that the hon. Gentleman's presentation is excellent. Quinquennial reviews are obviously admirable institutions, but on this occasion it is clear that the quinquennial review about which he is talking in no way meets the eloquent points that have been raised not only by me, but by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) and others.

In the circumstances, I do not see any point in delaying the Committee with a vote.

Mr. John Greenway: Shame.

Mr. Dewar: I would have thought that that was a cause for celebration and cheer on the hon. Gentleman's part. Conservative Members should recognise a Christmas present when they are offered one. It seems very uncharitable and unseasonable for Conservative Members to mock in this way.

On this occasion I will beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a Third time.

10.54 pm

Mr. Bradley: We have had an extremely interesting Committee stage. If any merit has come out of the fact that the Bill has been guillotined—there is only one merit—it is that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has been able to participate so effectively in the Committee. He has brought great knowledge and a particular humour to our proceedings. We should welcome that as we run up to the end of this part of the Session.

On Second Reading, we concentrated very much on the consequences of increasing the national insurance contribution by 1 per cent. from 9 per cent. to 10 per cent. It is worth repeating yet again what the real consequences of that are. Through the back door, the Government are giving the biggest hike to taxation. The increase will bring in a staggering £2·26 billion in revenue in a full year. If the Government had been honest in the Budget and had raised taxation, they would not have received as much money. They would have received £360 million less than they are getting from this massive imposition of national insurance.

What has come clearly out of our debates today and yesterday is what the Government failed to tell the British people during the general election campaign. The Conservatives claimed that they were the party of low taxation. All that myth has now been exploded. I do not believe that the British people who, from next April, will on average have to pay £9 or £10 a week extra in total taxation and £16 on average the following year will ever again believe this Government.

This is the biggest hike in taxation. It is very pleasing that the former Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), is in the Chamber to listen to the description of the effects of his policies. The new Chancellor—I quote from the Daily Mail—admitted the truth to the Treasury Select Committee yesterday:

> "Clarke comes clean. Kenneth Clarke admitted last night that this year's Budget has raised the equivalent of 7p on the basic rate of income tax."

We know that, in conjunction with the national insurance contribution, people throughout the country will suffer, and suffer and suffer from the consequences of the Government's policies.

Through our debates, we have also been able to winkle out from the Government some important facts not only about the consequences of the increase in national insurance contribution, but about the effect on people of not being able to draw certain benefits in future. Two issues are worth reinforcing on Third Reading. I welcome our future opportunity to debate in greater detail the new job seeker's allowance. We have found out not only what was clear from the start—that it was about reducing the amount of benefit and about reducing eligibility from 12 months to six months—but, most importantly, that anyone under 25 who receives the new job seeker's allowance will get it at a reduced rate. That is a lower rate of income support. It is also clear that the dependants' addition will be significantly reduced under the new scheme.

It is a disgrace and scandal that the 3 million officially unemployed people will pay the price, not only through a reduction in the eligibility to benefit to six months, when many of them, through the contributory system, have paid into the fund and believed that they had a right to proper levels of unemployment benefit as a result, but young people up to the age of 25 will have their benefit reduced to income support level. That is a disgrace, and when it is properly understood, there will be a furore and campaigns against what the Government are proposing. The Minister may laugh, but the 3 million unemployed are not laughing. They are suffering from the consequences of the economic mismanagement of the Government.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Opposition spokesman to mislead the House? There are not 3 million unemployed, and he ought to know——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) is responsible for his own speech.

Mr. Bradley: I understand exactly what the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) is saying. I understand that, over the 14 years of this Tory Government, they have fiddled the figures 19, 20 or 21 times to cover up the real total of over 4 million unemployed—that is, all those eligible to look for work, but ineligible to claim benefit because that right has been taken away from them. We understand what is going on, and we shall fight to protect the interests of those 4 million people.

You have not only curtailed the right to benefit for unemployed people. We shall look in great detail at the second exposure resulting from the debates in the past couple of days. That is the exposure of the way in which you are going to treat people with an incapacity, people who are sick and those who have disabilities. Not only will their right to a decent level of benefit be curtailed through the draconian measures that you are likely to introduce, but——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is getting a bit carried away. The Chair is not responsible for anything in this Bill, or any other.

Mr. Bradley: I accept what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had no intention of drawing you into the net of the guilty people who sit on the Treasury Bench, who will significantly reduce the living standards of thousands of disabled people through the imposition of the new assessment of incapacity.

We know that such people will be caught in a trap, a trap that we exposed in the debate on the Statutory Sick Pay Bill yesterday. Because of the extra burden of having to pay statutory sick pay, employers will look carefully at people's health records. People with health problems will be denied the right to a decent benefit. They will be caught in a trap—too ill to work but not ill enough to receive benefit from this miserly Government. We are determined that, when the Bill dealing with incapacity goes into Committee, we shall look at every line dealing with the way that assessments are done. What you are doing——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already told the hon. Gentleman that the Chair is doing nothing. I am only conducting the debate, in accordance with the rules of procedure. I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would bear that in mind.

Mr. Bradley: I apologise. As we enter the Christmas period, we feel even more the ways in which the people whom we represent are being downtrodden. I apologise for getting emotional. We are trying to protect the vulnerable —the people who do not have the income to match that of Tory Members. We are trying to protect them against the ravages of an incompetent Government, who in one day can lose £7 billion. At the same time they try to cut the benefits of the most vulnerable people in society. Such are this Government's priorities.

The Secretary of State is so appalled and is such a guilty man that he cannot even come to the Chamber to hear the closing speeches on this legislation. Where is he? I think I perhaps know. I suspect that there is an argument going on between the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State about the other area that we are determined to protect—the right to a decent level of state retirement pension.

The Chief Secretary is not interested in the future needs of people for the state retirement pension. He is looking for it to be continually eroded so that it has no real value in future. He believes that the state should not provide this sum in the 21st century and that everyone should look to the private market for an income in their old age. That is not good enough for us. We shall protect the elderly. We do not accept the arguments put to us and directed clearly by the Chief Secretary. We shall ensure that the millions of elderly people are properly protected by the policies of a Labour party committed to the interests of the elderly.

Today's debate has given my hon. Friends adequate opportunity to expose the Government's hypocrisy and the way in which they are trying to con the British people into believing that if direct taxation does not increase, somehow national insurance contribution increases are a side issue and do not affect pay packets in the same way. I assure Ministers that on 1 April next year when the public receive their pay slips the Government's con will be exposed.

At the same time as incomes are ravaged and limited by tax and national insurance impositions, bills will come through doors demanding VAT on fuel. Then the public will look at how mortgage interest tax relief has been eroded; they will look towards future travel and holidays and see that they have to pay tax on that. As their bills come in for home insurance and car insurance, it will be tax, tax, tax.

That from a party that went into the general election saying that it was the party of low taxation, that it had no plans and no need to raise taxation. Its hoardings argued against the Labour party's tax policies. Yet look what the country is having to suffer as a result of the mismanagement of the economy by these Ministers and all their guilty colleagues.

We have failed—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. For the last two minutes it might be wise for the House to settle down.

Mr. Hague: To help the hon. Gentleman through the last two minutes, may I suggest that he spends them by informing the House how the Labour party proposes to meet the shortfall in the national insurance fund?

Mr. Bradley: Is not it incredible that when Britain is faced with the biggest tax hike ever, amounting to £9 a week for the average family this year and £16 next year, the Government can ask only what we would do? The Government are responsible for what is happening. The Minister and all his right hon. and hon. Friends are the guilty men whom we have exposed during the past two days. We may not have won a vote in those two days, but I am assured that we have won the hearts and minds of the British people who know only too well where the guilt lies for the economic consequences.

It being six hours after the commencement of proceedings on Second Reading, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [14 December]:—

Television Violence

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

11.34 pm

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I am delighted to have the opportunity to debate a very important matter—the effect of violence shown on television, films and video on the behaviour of children.

We all know of the recent tragic case of James Bulger, and I believe that all hon. Members on both sides of the House were deeply distressed by it. When I heard reports of the trial and read some of the transcript, and found out that one of the young boys who had committed the murder had been watching a video called "Child's Play 3", I was absolutely horrified. The fact that a child that age was allowed to watch a video with that sort of content is cause for all of us to be gravely concerned.

It is also cause for grave concern that 181,000 children watched the same film on BSkyB, of whom 42,000 were under the age of nine. I feel strongly that it should not have been broadcast; but I also feel that the children's parents should not have allowed them to watch it. There must be parental responsibility. I cannot say much about the Suzanne Capper trial, except that the alleged perpetrators were apparently chanting the tune from the same film.

I believe that a royal commission should be set up to discover the causes of violence. I know that the Archbishop of Westminster and the Chief Rabbi have called for one, and my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) has tabled an early-day motion which was signed by 100 hon. Members, including me. However, we have not managed to bring about the setting up of such a commission.

I do not believe that a matter such as this is or should be party political. Hon. Members of all parties are deeply concerned about the level of violence in today's society. We must establish why those children committed that crime—and, indeed, why there is so much violence in society nowadays. It is all very well to cite poverty and poor living conditions; although they may contribute to the problem, I genuinely believe that children especially are desensitised by the diet of violence that they are fed by television, films and videos, day after day, as they sit in front of their television sets.

The majority of parents are very responsible, but many are not. Instead of entertaining their children—taking them out and spending time with them—they much prefer to go to the video shop. Quite often, they do not check the content of the videos that they take out before sitting their children down in front of the television. Those children become more and more used to violence; the more they see, the more they feel that that is the normal way in which to behave. If they cannot get something by means of reason, they will hit out.

Some say that there is no link between the violence on television and the violence in society—that there is no proof. That is why I believe that more research is needed. The public, however, do believe that there is a link. A recent TV Times survey found that 59 per cent. of viewers thought there was a link between television violence and violence in society, while 85 per cent. felt that television companies were not careful enough about what they screened. Even the Broadcasting Standards Commission said that complaints had trebled in the 12 months before last July.

I know that television films and videos have changed a great deal in those 12 months, but they changed even more in the years before that. That is one of the main problems. Films, television shows and videos have become more and more realistic. When I was younger I used to watch "Dixon of Dock Green". It was a crime series, but we never saw the violence that we see today. There was not the realism that we see today. The same applied to popular children's programmes such as "Popeye". There was always a moral, Popeye always won through. That may be simplifying matters, but there was a moral and the goodie always won. Today, I do not believe that the goodie does win. We must ensure that we have a certain morality running through television, films and video.

It is a tribute to the directors, producers, writers and actors that there is more realism today. It is no longer like "Dr. Who" or cowboys and indians. Many people who do not believe that there is a link say, "I grew up with cowboys and indians and it did not harm me." Children do not see cowboys, red indians or daleks in the street every day. That is the difference. What they see on their screens today is something that they know. They see a real person who could be their neighbour, the man down the street or a child who they know, committing acts of violence.

Many years ago when I worked with children, I asked them about violence and television. I did not ask them whether it had any influence on their behaviour, but I asked them whether they were terrified by violence. Incredibly, they proved the theory. I asked about "Dr. Who". They said, "That is fantasy. I have never met a dalek. I do not have nightmares about that." Most of them had nightmares about real-life drama, things with which they could identify.

There are many television shows, films and videos that are not as extreme as those watched by the children in the James Bulger case. Some films appear to be totally innocuous. I went to see "Home Alone 2". It was the first film that I had been to see in about a year. I had an evening off and that was the only cinema in which I could get a seat. I went with some friends who have children, one of whom is seven years old. She did not come with us, but I asked her parents later whether they would have let her come to the film. They said, "Yes, of course. What about all the other children there?"

In the film, a little boy went to the top of a building and started hurling bricks on to the villain. He was knocked out, but got up after 30 seconds. Another brick came down on top of him and he again got up. He then went into a building and was electrocuted. His hair stood on end and he went black all over. He survived everything. We did not see the real effect of the violence.

Children as young as four and five were watching that film. I do not think that they would have wanted to be violent or that it would necessarily have affected them in a violent way. However, films that do not show the consequences of violence are just as bad. Children will ape what they see on a television screen or in a film. They may go out and think, "I'll throw a brick at another child. It won't harm him. I saw it in a film and the person got up." I am not saying that we should ban such films, but we should ensure that their producers and writers look carefully at the sort of programmes that they are making.

[Ms Liz Lynne]

Some time ago I watched "Kilroy" because it was specifically about television and violence. There were two prisoners on day release from prison. One of them was asked, "Why did you commit your crime?" He said, "I saw it on Crimewatch. I saw someone go into a building society, steal the money and get away with it and I thought, 'I'm broke and that's an easy way to make money.'" He was caught. How many people watch those sorts of programmes? I am not saying that we should ban them, but programme makers must be responsible.

I am very worried about real-life crime and its effect on children as well. Many of them see it, as many programmes now depict and dramatise what has happened in real life. Again, I think that that is a worrying way to go about things.

There has to be a link between crime and video nasties and all the violence that we see in the media. If there was not a link and people did not feel that television influenced them, why would advertisers spend £1·7 billion a year on advertising their products? They cannot say, on the one hand, that it influences people who watch television and, on the other, that it does not. It either does or it does not.

We must ask ourselves what we should do about it. As I said, I feel that we need a royal commission to consider why people, especially children, are violent. I would like there to be a new classification, "Not suitable for home entertainment", on videos so that when parents go into shops they know that they cannot show them to their children. I want broadcasters to mark programmes with a "V" for violence. Perhaps that is a step in the right direction. We will not be able to get them to change overnight, but we might be able to persuade them to do so gradually.

How do we make parents responsible? How do we teach them to teach their children the difference between fact and fiction? We must study that seriously.

The BBC guidelines already state that a blow to the head must be treated as a serious matter. I want television companies to monitor whether those guidelines are working in practice. I suspect that they are not. They read very well, but from watching some programmes, I do not feel that some companies are following their own guidelines.

I would like actors, writers, directors and producers, along with politicians, to come together into some form of organisation to try to change the way in which people think and the programmes that are made. Writers could write programmes and plays with a far more positive message and we could get away from the climate of violence.

I congratulate Sir Anthony Hopkins, who, when asked to make a sequel to "The Silence of the Lambs", refused because he suddenly realised what sort of effect the first film had had on people, and Stanley Kubrik, who abandoned "A Clockwork Orange" because a tramp was beaten up after its first screening.

People in the profession need to be mobilised and politicians on both sides of the House must mobilise with people in the industry and ensure that we do something to stop the diet of violence.

If negative images influence people, positive images must, too. We must persuade programme makers to put positive images on our screens. Most importantly, we must all treat the matter seriously. I know that hon. Members in the House tonight do so and that they are here because they know that violence has got totally out of control and that something has to be done. I sincerely hope that we will be able to set up a royal commission.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) on obtaining this debate and raising this important issue. She is right. As she will know, it is unusual to have more than just a few hon. Members in the House for an Adjournment debate, but she is supported by her hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) and I see my hon. Friends the Members for Langaurgh (Mr. Bates, for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant), for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), for Dover (Mr. Shaw) and for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) as well. I think that it was quite unique that, as the hon. Lady was talking, all around me I could hear murmurs of, "Yes, I agree with that", "She's absolutely right" and "She has hit the nail on the head" in response to so many of her arguments.

Of course, the debate has understandably attained particular prominence following the judge's remarks in the case arising from the tragic death of James Bulger. The whole House will be grateful to the hon. Member for Rochdale for her work, in association with my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) and others, in helping to draw attention to the challenge presented to society by the worst violent and pornographic material. In particular this evening, she has drawn attention to the paramount importance of protecting children from harmful influences.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has already made clear the Government's great concern about the murder of James Bulger and has expressed the sympathy that the whole House must feel for James's parents. I am sure that the House would like to take this opportunity to congratulate them on the birth of their new son, although of course nothing can make up for the son they have lost.

The murder of a child is always an appalling crime, whatever the circumstances. Nevertheless, it comes as no surprise that the James Bulger case has provoked such great concern, given the involvement of children both as perpetrators and as victim. Thankfully, murder carried out by young children is extremely rare. It may, therefore, be unsafe to draw any wider conclusions from that particular case.

Nevertheless, my right hon. and learned Friend and I have noted the remarks made by the trial judge, Mr. Justice Morland, who suggested that one explanation for the murder might be exposure to violent videos. We are currently studying these remarks, together with the views of the police officers who investigated the case. We shall also examine the results of current research into the viewing behaviour of juvenile offenders, which has been commissioned jointly by the British Board of Film Classification, the Broadcasting Standards Council, the BBC and the Independent Television Commission. The results of that research are expected to be published in the new year.

Of course, there has already been extensive research into the possibility of a link between on-screen violence and violent behaviour. Many hon. Members will have seen the reports in the press only yesterday about a new study which suggests that the playing of violent computer games encourages aggression in about one in five of the children who play them.

The balance of the research undertaken so far has failed to produce satisfactory evidence that a direct causal effect exists between exposure to violent material and the commission of violent crime. There are probably insuperable practical limitations to what it is possible for such research to achieve in investigating the causes of human behaviour.

None the less, we shall all accept that films, videos, television and computer games are powerful media. Simple common sense tells us that they must have some effect on at least part of their audience. I look at it this way: last year in the United Kingdom, our two commercial terrestrial channels alone generated some £1·7 billion in advertising revenue. Is it likely that advertisers—hard-faced capitalists—would be prepared to spend such vast sums if they did not believe that television could have some influence on people's choices or form their opinions? Of course it does. The Government therefore take the view that all broadcasters, film-makers and video games manufacturers should exercise due caution and assume that there may be some relationship between what they do and the way in which some people behave.

Following the murder of James Bulger there have been calls for the Government to take tough action to ban video nasties, violent videos and computer games and violence on television. I can well understand the concern that has led to such pressure, but as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has made clear, it would not be right for the Government to rush into snap judgments on the issue, particularly on the question of any wider implications for the criminal law. We need to consider it carefully.

The Government have considerable sympathy for those who say that there is too much violence in the media and that too often children are exposed to violent films or videos which can turn any child and which we would prefer them not to see.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Does my hon. Friend accept that it is a fallacy to suppose that we can protect children from watching violent material simply by screening it after 9 pm or any other hour? Does he agree that, whatever we do, if such material is broadcast young children will see it and, therefore, the only answer is to ban it altogether?

Mr. Maclean: I largely accept that argument. We all know that it is usually only young children who can work the latest video recorders. I do not know whether watching violent films or videos can turn any child or adult into a murderer. But, as I have said, I believe that violent and horrific material must have some effect on a susceptible minority. That is one reason why our controls on videos, films and broadcasting are already among the most stringent in the world.

I shall briefly describe those controls, but before I do, I shall remind the House that they form only part of a much wider system of regulation over what children watch and how they behave. Of course, I am referring to the exercise of parental responsibility, to which the hon. Lady so rightly and wisely referred. That is a much more effective means of controlling children's behaviour than any system of regulation the Government could hope to establish. There is an obvious need for all of us who are responsible for children to ensure that they are not allowed to see unsuitable material. There is also a clear need for film makers, video producers and broadcasters to think very carefully about their wider responsibilities to society.

The Government recognise that there is considerable concern about the availability of violent and horrific videos, including video and computer games. The hon. Lady's comments about the difference between fantasy films and reality struck a chord with me and my hon. Friends. We can all watch films, including some of my favourites such as "Star Trek". They are wonderful escapism and I do not think that people realistically put themselves in that position.

I agree with the hon. Lady that some of the films which might—I say "might" because I do not have research to back this up, and I do not have research to prove I am wrong either—be the most dangerous do not appear to be the most obvious ones. I am referring to "The Termminator" and "Rambo". Those films may seem to be nice family videos, but the hon. Lady correctly said that there is a lot of violence and the baddies continue to get up and appear completely uninjured. I would love to know the effect of that on the susceptible minority.

We must all remember that we are not so much worried about the 95 per cent. of people who can watch a violent film or any type of material and not be affected or be depraved or corrupted. The problem is the susceptible minority who might be depraved or corrupted. I digressed slightly because the hon. Lady made a very good point.

All of us know where we might draw the line on the sort of violent material that we would not like 18-year-olds, 15-year-olds, children or, indeed, other members of our family to see. The difficulty is that if we redraw the line on violence, how do we transcribe that into guidelines or language to give to broadcasters or video producers? That is a difficulty that I am addressing at present.

Despite those difficulties, our existing system of video censorship and classification is already one of the most rigorous in the world. Under the Video Recordings Act 1984, all video works, apart from a small category of innocuous exempt material, must be submitted to the British Board of Film Classification for classificiation. The BBFC is an independent body and Ministers have no power to control or review its classification decisions. Under the Act, it is a criminal offence to supply a video which has not been classified by the BBFC or to supply a video in breach of the age classification awarded. The maximum penalty for supplying an unclassified video is a £20,000 fine, and the maximum penalty for the offence of under-age supply is a £5,000 fine. The hon. Lady suggested that perhaps we could legislate to introduce a new category of films not suitable for viewing in the home, but that would be no different from the present system.

We already require the BBFC to follow certain guidelines when performing its statutory classification duties. It must take into account the fact that videos are seen in the home and may therefore need to be censored or classified more restrictively than video films because children may replay them and see the one piece of violence repeatedly, which they would not normally do in the cinema. The BBFC must also seek to avoid classifying any work which could be considered obscene or otherwise unlawful.

When classifying films for video, the BBFC scrutinises every work in its entirety and adopts an active editing policy. It does not simply extend the same classification as was granted for cinema release, and frequently places films in a more restrictive age category, as well as requiring additional cuts of violent or explicit scenes which may be played over and over again in isolation and which are therefore unsuitable for viewing in the home, where access is not as strictly controlled as at a cinema. If the BBFC believes that a particular film is simply not suitable for home viewing in any circumstances, it will refuse video classification altogether.

We have already taken action to improve the enforcement of the 1984 Act. During the previous Session, we supported a Bill introduced by Lord Birkett—a vice-president of the BBFC—and in this House by my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth), which extended the time limit for the commencement of prosecutions under the Act. It also streamlined the procedure by which the BBFC may give evidence as to whether a particular video work either has or has not been classified. That Bill came into force on 20 September.

We will be taking further action under the forthcoming Criminal Justice Bill to give local authority trading standards officers stronger powers to enforce the 1984 Act by enabling them to investigate an entire chain of video supplies which is outside their area. The Bill will also contain other provisions designed to strengthen the enforcement of our legal controls on obscene material and child pornography. They will create new police powers of search and seizure; a new power of arrest for obscenity and child pornography offences; increase the maximum penalty for the mere possession of child pornography and extend the law to cover simulated child pornography that is manufactured by computer, where a real child is the basis of the photograph. We will also consider carefully the report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, which is currently inquiring into computer pornography.

Video and computer games constitute video recordings for the purposes of the 1984 Act, but most games are exempt from the classification requirement under the Act. However, such games forfeit their exemption if they depict, to any significant extent, human sexual activity, the mutilation or torture of or gross violence towards humans or animals, or human genital organs. Games of this nature must be submitted for classification in the usual way. Probably the most famous one is the Sega game, "Night Trap", which has already been classified as "15" because of its use of real actors. As technology advances and the number of video games using realistic footage of real actors increases, the number of games requiring classification and possibly censorship is also likely to increase. In future, I believe that there might be a great expansion in such games as the technology improves. We are keeping a close eye on that sector.

I acknowledge the work done in a recent survey by Dr. Mark Griffiths and Mr. Nigel Hunt, which suggests that there may also be room for concern about the effects of those games which use what are very clearly computer graphics and which do not resemble real life or real people. This is why I welcome the work which the computer games industry itself, led by companies like Sega, has done under the aegis of the European Leisure Software Publishers Association—ELSPA—to establish an effective code of practice and a voluntary age classification system for those computer games which are exempt from classification as videos.

We have developed a system of media regulation in the United Kingdom based on arms-length principles and it is a long-standing tradition that the Government do not seek to intervene in matters such as programme content or scheduling. Within this framework, the responsibility for what is broadcast rests with the broadcaster and the broadcasting regulatory bodies, the BBC, the Independent Television Commission, the Welsh Fourth Channel authority and the Radio Authority. They are independent of Government and responsible to Parliament for safeguarding the public interest in broadcasting.

The Broadcasting Act 1990 places a clear framework for the independent broadcasters to follow with regard to broadcasting standards. The Act sets a statutory duty on the ITC to ensure that all its licensed services include nothing in their programmes

> "which offends against good taste and decency, is likely to encourage or incite to crime or to lead to disorder, or to be offensive to public feeling".

Similar provisions are also contained in the licence and agreement which set the framework for the BBC's operations.

Our broadcasting regulatory bodies also maintain detailed codes of practice for broadcasters and programme makers. In July this year, the BBC and the ITC issued revised tightened guidelines for their programme producers and purchasers on the portrayal of violence. Those guidelines prohibit the use of gratuitous violence —although we could all argue about what that is. They also require that the consequences of violent acts are not overlooked; that close attention is paid to the scheduling of violent programmes and advice given on the use of clear "on-air" warnings; and that warnings should be given of the dangers of broadcasting material depicting violent behaviour which children might imitate.

Israel

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

9.34 am

Sir Thomas Arnold (Hazel Grove): I am grateful for the opportunity to address the House on the subject of British policy towards Israel at the United Nations. This year's General Assembly is now coming to a conclusion, and the debate will give the Government an opportunity to comment on the ways that Britain is seeking to further the peace process, both at the United Nations and in terms of our interests and responsibilities in the middle east.

I am looking forward to hearing what my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister has to say about Britain's attitude towards the many resolutions on the middle east, which come up year after year at the United Nations General Assembly in New York.

As long ago as 1982, I was able to secure an Adjournment debate on Britain's responsibilities under the United Nations charter for our dependent territories. I did so because, in late 1982, I spent some two months at the General Assembly as the parliamentary delegate from the United Kingdom. That experience taught me that the United Nations is a Parliament. Like every Parliament, if it is to function properly, it has what we would call Standing Orders. It has precise rules and procedures. The countries that perform effectively at the United Nations are those which, like Britain, have mastered the fine print of the United Nations charter and mastered in turn the way that a country must learn the Standing Orders of the United Nations to undertake the day-to-day work with speed and efficiency.

At the time of the Falklands, the role of the British mission in New York was not only vital to this country's effort but exemplary in terms of the contribution that our diplomats made. I do not believe that that contribution could have been as successful as it was had they not been masters of the art of United Nations diplomacy, which frequently means having an understanding of the fine print, not just of documents but of the rules of the organisation.

I believe that the peace process needs every possible encouragement. It continues to be fragile and we should therefore do everything that we possibly can to assist. I want particularly to raise the question of Israel's participation in a regional group. That issue has come up on previous occasions, and requires some clarification as the peace process develops.

I should like to see Israel playing a fuller part in the work of the United Nations, not least because that might help to make Israel's response on some issues less defensive, and would at the same time try to encourage and assist the situation in which Israel and the Arab countries can be seen to be working more closely together.

As I understand it, Israel is the only country which, unwillingly, does not belong to any regional group. That means that it cannot participate fully in the proceedings and work of the United Nations, with the adverse consequences to which I was referring earlier. I agree that Israel belongs naturally to the Asian group, but it is not accepted there because of Arab resistance.

As I understand it, Israel just wants to be treated as a normal country, in United Nations terms, and wants to be more involved and be elected to United Nations bodies. In that sense, Israel is isolated, because it is only by belonging to a regional grouping that a country can participate in internal United Nations elections or eventually become a member of the Security Council.

Israel has sought to deal with that problem by applying for temporary membership of the Western European and others group—temporary because, once peace in the middle east is established, Israel should join the Asian group. As I understand it, Israel is already accepted in the Western European and others group in other international organisations, such as the World Health Organisation, the International Labour Organisation, UNESCO and the Food and Agriculture Organisation.

I believe that rights bring responsibilities, and Israel's membership of a regional grouping within the United Nations would mean not only that it would take on the benefits of membership, but that its closer relationship with other group members could grant scope for a more responsive dialogue between the member countries. I attach weight and importance to that argument.

In that regard, the position of the United States is interesting. I note that in 1992, for example, a spokesman for the United States Department of State, Office of Assistant Secretary, was asked by the press the following question about Israel and the United Nations:

> "Does the United States have a position on whether Israel should be able to enjoy membership in the UN's elective offices, such as the Security Council?"

The answer was unequivocally

> "Yes, the United States strongly favours full Israeli eligibility for UN elective offices such as the Security Council. This is why we strongly support Israel's membership in one of the five regional groupings at the UN, which propose candidates for elective offices. Israel is not now a member of a regional grouping. For a number of years we have supported Israel's membership in a regional grouping, and we will continue to do so."

That is a clear statement of the United States' position. Canada and the Netherlands support that stance, and the remainder say that they would support a consensus to admit Israel, but will not lobby for it. I should be grateful if my right hon. and learned Friend could clarify the present position.

In July, in an answer to the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar), my right hon. and learned Friend said:

> "We believe Israel should be allowed into the Asian group of the United Nations. But until they are, we would not object to Israeli membership of the Western European and others group of the United Nations if there was a consensus among other member states."—[Official Report, 16 July 1993; Vol. 211, c. 725.]

On 13 August, I received a letter from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, which noted:

> "We have discussed this issue with EC colleagues and it is clear that there is no consensus in favour of Israeli membership of WEOG"—

the Western European and others group—

> "Our EC partners are fully aware of our own position."

[Sir Thomas Arnold]

In those circumstances, I should welcome further clarification of how the Government see the British position and their view on the way ahead on this issue.

At this juncture, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the implications of the arguments about Israel's membership of a regional grouping for the chemical weapons convention. At the 47th United Nations General Assembly, Israel co-sponsored the resolution endorsing that convention. On 13 January this year, it signed that convention in Paris, therefore making Israel one of the original signatories. As a consequence, Israel decided to send a delegation to participate in the work of PrepCom—the preparatory commission of the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons—which is based in the Hague. Israel signed that convention with strong encouragement from the west.

Israel believes that that act should have strengthened its case for membership of the Western European and others group, particularly since some of Israel's neighbours still have chemical weapons. I should be grateful if my right hon. and learned Friend could say how he sees Israel's position within the particular context of the chemical weapons convention.

The wider question of British policy towards Israel and the middle east, as expressed in resolutions at the General Assembly and with particular reference to those passed this autumn, should be considered. For as long as I can remember, the texts of Security Council resolution 242 of 22 November 1967 and resolution 338 of 22 October 1973 have been the bedrock of the United Nations position on the middle east and that of many member countries. As the years have rolled by, the references to those resolutions have multiplied. Time and again, the House and other Parliaments have had detailed discussions of those resolutions and their implications.

As I understand it, the news from New York this week is that a new resolution has been tabled, which seems to represent a welcome step forward. It enjoys 105 sponsors, one of which is Britain. The resolution was adopted this week, with a vote of 155 member countries in favour. There was only one abstention, and Libya and three other countries voted against—Syria, the Lebanon and Iran. I should like my right hon. and learned Friend to say whether he believes that that new resolution will, in effect, be the bedrock resolution on which further debate and discussions at the United Nations will take place.

I note that the resolution refers to the earlier resolutions 242 and 338. It goes on to review the startling progress that has been made this year in seeking to bring peace to the middle east. It calls on member states to do everything possible to take that process further. I am sure that all hon. Members will attach great importance to that aim.

I should like to draw the attention of the House to correspondence that took place late in 1992 between a group of United States Senators and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, because it highlights a problem that still exists. Those Senators pointed out:

> "over 30 anti-Israeli resolutions are passed each year in the United Nations with the specific objective of condemning and embarrassing the government of Israel . . . We believe these resolutions are unjustified . . . In our opinion, Israel should be commended for its commitment to the peace talks rather than openly condemned in resolutions at the General Assembly."

My right hon. Friend replied:

> "We have made clear to the Arabs . . . our view that ritual condemnation of Israel in United Nations' resolutions is counter-productive, hindering rather than promoting the peace process."

I invite my right hon. and learned Friend to comment on the present situation and whether he believes that the plethora of resolutions at the UN General Assembly could now be reduced. May we take it that, henceforth, the resolution that was passed this week will be the principal resolution, and that it will be possible to concentrate on its wording, rather than deal continuously with other anti-Israeli resolutions, which have done so much damage in the past?

I welcome the changes that have taken place this year. I draw the attention of the House to the resolution on Israeli nuclear armament. In 1992, Britain abstained on that resolution, the text of which deplored Israel's refusal to renounce possession of nuclear weapons and urged it to accede to the treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons convention.

That has been replaced this year by the call on Israel to renounce its possession of nuclear weapons and to accede to the treaty on non-proliferation. The United Kingdom and the rest of the European Community member states voted against that resolution.

What does my right hon. and learned Friend think will be the future approach to that resolution and others? Will it be British policy at the UN to try to persuade other countries to forgo resolutions of that kind in the foreseeable future? They do not help the peace process; in many respects, they hinder it, for the various reasons that I have given.

I remind the House that, although the UN has at times not seemed an especially appropriate place in which to further the aims of British diplomacy and there are occasions on which it is easy to become bogged down in what my noble Friend Baroness Thatcher referred to as a procedural morass, times change and, in the middle east, the UN has always participated in the various peace talks and working parties that have been set up; certainly, that situation will not change.

An understanding and knowledge of the rules of the organisation are essential if Israel, Britain and other countries are to pursue their diplomacy effectively. If Israel were allowed into a regional grouping, it would bring about an improvement in the present situation in New York.

The more that Israel can be encouraged to co-operate and to look for means whereby she can further her diplomacy in a manner that is consistent with the objectives that we all want to see fulfilled, the more that the peace process will be enhanced. I believe that British policy at the UN has been directed towards furthering that wholly necessary objective. I look forward to the reply of my right hon. and learned Friend on those specific points.

9.52 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Sir T. Arnold) for raising this subject and for giving me the opportunity to respond to the important points that he has made. It is a great pleasure to see my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope) on the Front Bench; his interest in these matters and concern for the state of Israel is well known.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove began by speaking highly of the skills of the United Kingdom diplomats who work in New York. I entirely agree. I am sure that the House will agree that the reputations of Sir David Hannay and his colleagues are second to none. I pay tribute to Sir David Hannay and his colleagues, and thank them for the warm welcome they gave Members of the House who visited the UN some two or three weeks ago.

My hon. Friend concentrated at some length on the possibility of Israel's becoming a member of the Western European and others group, and also of participating in the organisation of the preparatory commission on the prohibition of chemical weapons.

Our position on Israel's admission to WEOG is as follows: like my hon. Friend, we believe that Israel's proper home is in the Asian group. We are at one on that. As my hon. Friend knows, there is a delicate balance to be struck between the regional groups in the UN system. WEOG has not accepted any member from outside the western European area in the past 40 years and, for that reason, there are natural inhibitions about doing so now. However, at the same time, we do not wish to be unhelpful towards Israel and we will not block a consensus in favour of Israel membership on a temporary basis. We anticipate that the membership will be renewed annually.

It is not for us to lobby for Israeli membership, but if there is consensus, we will not seek to block it, and will be content to see Israel as a temporary member of WEOG. The Government of Israel know that fact, partly because we have disclosed it to our colleagues and partly because, when I saw Foreign Minister Peres in Vienna earlier in the year, I stated our position clearly. I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured on that point.

My hon. Friend also raised the question of Israel's membership of the preparatory commission of the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons at the Hague on 15 December. It was agreed to accept conditionally Israel's request for temporary membership, pending its admission to the Asian group. I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured by that fact.

The debate in the General Assembly took place against the background of the developments in the middle east. Is the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) seeking to intervene?

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie) indicated dissent.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful. I would have truncated my remarks if the hon. Member had wanted to intervene.

The breakthrough in the negotiations between the Palestine Liberation Organisation and Israel was a tremendous achievement and has unquestionably affected all our attitudes to the problem of the Arab-Israeli dispute. The handshake on the White House lawn on 13 September is an image which will rest in our minds for a long time, as will the visit of Chairman Arafat to London.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary gave a lunch for Chairman Arafat and, in many ways, it was an extraordinary occasion. Chairman Arafat was a welcome guest to lunch, and also present were the Israeli ambassador to London, the President of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, Judge Finestein, and the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner).

We should give credit to the United States. In a sense, the breakthrough was the result of the Madrid process. It would not have begun without the initiative of Secretary Baker and President Bush, which was carried forward by the Norwegians in the Oslo talks. The process in Madrid that began in October 1991 was based on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338. Those resolutions and the principle of land for peace which is reflected in them, remain the basis for all negotiations.

In the declaration of principles signed by Israel and the PLO, the aim of the negotiations is described as a permanent settlement based on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 and the permanent status negotiations aim at the implementations of those resolutions.

Against that background, we and our partners in the European Union have taken a fresh look at all the resolutions that concern Israel—as have the Arab states, which drafted many of those resolutions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove referred to the new resolution. We were delighted to be able to co-sponsor that new resolution, which we thought was forward looking, in that it welcomed the developments in the peace process. My hon. Friend rightly said that that resolution was adopted by a huge majority, with 155 votes for, three against and one abstention. Israel herself voted in favour. I hope that that is symptomatic of a new atmosphere of co-operation and relative harmony in New York.

I am glad to say that this year's resolutions have been much less condemnatory in tone than those in previous years, and that has made it possible for more resolutions to be adopted by consensus. I hope that people will be careful not to draft or seek to push through one-sided resolutions in the context of the debate in the middle east.

We must all be conscious that there are constituencies on both sides—in the state of Israel and in the occupied territories—that have to be carried if the peace process is to survive. It is unhelpful to pass one-sided resolutions that alienate one or other of the constituents. We need to be even handed in this matter.

Lebanon's opposition to the new resolution came about because there was no express reference to Security Council resolution 425—which does, of course, require Israel to withdraw from Lebanon. I should like to take this opportunity again to reiterate the support that Her Majesty's Government give support to resolution 425 and to the need for a peaceful solution to the Lebanon track of the peace process.

In that context, it was a great pleasure for me to welcome yesterday to London the Foreign Minister of Lebanon. I am pleased that the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie had the opportunity to talk to him. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary had a substantive meeting with him yesterday afternoon, which was no doubt extremely helpful, I hope for both sides.

The recent euphoria that has come about because of the agreement between Israel and the PLO emphasises the value that everybody places on movement. However, the Government adhere to the belief that peace in the middle east requires more than just a deal between those two parties. I have always taken the view that one cannot get a lasting settlement in the middle east unless and until there is an agreement between the Palestinians the state of Israel. It is a mistake to suppose that there is the possibility of making bilateral agreements between the state of Israel and individual Arab states unless there is agreement between the state of Israel and Palestinians.

[Mr. Hogg]

Therefore, the agreement made between Chairman Arafat and Prime Minister Rabin is important not just because it opens up the possibility—even the probability—of a long-lasting accord between those two peoples, but because it unlocks the door to the wider, more comprehensive peace settlement that is essential. We need a comprehensive settlement that covers all tracks of the peace process and is freely agreed to by all the parties. I hope that, by next year, the General Assembly will be considering resolutions welcoming further progress on all tracks, including that of Syria and that of Lebanon.

Let me say a word about the Syrian track. The General Assembly resolutions have this year continued to address the question of the Golan Heights. We abstained on that question, as we have in the past, because we thought that the language would not help progress in the negotiations. But there can be no doubt about our support for attempts to resolve that problem as part of a comprehensive settlement.

An agreement between the state of Israel and Syria is, in my view, essential and urgent. Two key questions have to be addressed—first, the withdrawal by Israel from the Golan Heights and, secondly, the establishment of a full state of peace between Syria and the state of Israel.

One of the key problems at the moment is that both the negotiating parties are unwilling to make plain exactly what they mean by the concepts. What does the state of Israel mean by withdrawal? The Syrians are entitled to press the Israelis on that. And what does the state of Syria mean by peace—is it a full relationship between friendly states or is it merely a cessation of the state of hostility? The state of Israel is entitled to press President Assad on that.

Those negotiating positions must be opened up and disclosed as soon as possible. In that context, I welcome the fact that the parties are returning to talks, and that President Clinton is to hold a summit with President Assad. It is most important that the parties move urgently in those negotiations.

This week, we have seen the implementation of another resolution—Security Council resolution 799, which, as the House will recall, calls for the return of all those who were deported to south Lebanon at about this time last year. I am glad to say that all those who were deported and have spent the past 12 months in south Lebanon have now returned to the state of Israel.

Certain problems remain, however; they stand in the way of a peace process and need to be addressed. Perhaps most prominent of all is the Israeli settlement building in the occupied territories. It is true that settlement building has been reduced, but it has not been wholly stopped. That is particularly true of east Jerusalem. Not surprisingly, the Palestinians are deeply concerned by that.

We have taken every opportunity—I take the opportunity now—to say to our Israeli friends that the construction of fresh settlements is an obstacle to the peace process and we very much hope that it will stop. We voted for the General Assembly resolution condemning the settlement building.

In the light of the new situation this year, we have reconsidered how to vote on a number of Arab-Israeli resolutions. On the subject of Israeli nuclear armament, for instance, we felt that in the present situation it was no longer appropriate to refer only to Israel. The issue of security is an important one. Laying the foundations of the region's peace and security falls to each and every state in the area. All of them, without exception, need to be active in arms control and disarmament. All countries must play a full part in preventing the spread and build-up of weapons of mass destruction, which we regard as a major threat to security and stability in the area.

Nuclear non-proliferation is one of our highest security priorities. We fully support the concept of a nuclear weapons-free zone in the middle east, and we and our European partners supported the resolution calling for that at the United Nations General Assembly this year.

We do not, however, consider it desirable to single out one particular nation for condemnation. We prefer the subject to be dealt with in the overall context of peace in the middle east, so we voted against the resolution specific to Israeli nuclear armament. That is not, however, a sign that we take the issue less than seriously. We continue to call on Israel and all other states in the region to accede to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and to place all their nuclear facilities under full safeguard agreements with the Internationl Atomic Energy Agency.

Accession to the treaty by all states in the region, and their full compliance with its obligations, would be the best way to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction in the middle east. Similarly, we urge all states in the region that have not already done so to accede to the bilogical and chemical weapons convention as soon as possible. We fully support the work of the multilateral working group of the peace process on arms control and regional security.

I have already referred to WEOG and the chemical group. The 12 member states were pleased to be able to support the Israeli candidate for election to the UN administrative tribunal, and Mr. Gabay was elected on the first vote. The role of the United Nations in the middle east goes further than a string of resolutions. Hon. Members will be aware of the work being done by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian refugees. It is important work, which will not be diminished by the peace accord. We fully support that organisation—politically, with bilateral donations and through the European Community—and we will continue to do so.

The peace process is of historic importance. No part of the world is more volatile and dangerous than the middle east. The economic interests of the whole world are focused on it. Years of history, tradition, hostility, fighting, murder and religious divide make it an extraordinarily difficult problem to resolve.

There are very legitimate concerns on all sides. Israel has a legitimate concern for security and we must keep that very much in mind. The Palestinians have a legitimate concern to assert their political rights as a people to acquire land of their own and create a political entity. The Arab states also have legitimate concerns. Syria's territory is occupied, as is that of Lebanon.

There are problems not only of history and tradition but of current needs and priorities. Against that background, what Prime Minister Rabin and Chairman Arafat have done is an extraordinarily courageous and statesmanlike act. Chairman Arafat has put his personal security on the line, as well as his political reputation. President Rabin has also put his political reputation on the line. They were right to do so. It was no small matter and they both deserve credit.

It is for that reason, at least in part, that my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary were pleased to receive Chairman Arafat in London as a guest of the Government. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is looking forward to his visit to Israel and the occupied territories in January.

We must rally behind the peace process, politically and financially. We can do some good by sending messages and making clear what we believe to be true. The central problem is that important constituencies, in both the territories and the state of Israel, must be carried if the peace process is to last. People in the occupied territories must realise that powerful benefits flow from the accord and that it is not the end of the matter but the beginning.

To the state of Israel, I say, "Be generous; make progress with all possible speed; make it plain that you are withdrawing and that Jericho-Gaza is but the first step. Press on, be generous." To our Palestinian friends, I say, "You must take account of the genuine security interests of the state of Israel. Do not press for more than public opinion in Israel can currently give. If you do, the process will collapse. Encourage your Arab friends to get closer to the state of Israel. Relax the trade embargo that is seen as a major obstacle to the establishment of proper relations. Do your utmost to ensure that there is no further violence in the territories."

We will do all we can to make sure that the negotiating parties recognise those facts. It is an historic moment and all parties deserve credit for what they have achieved. We believe that the process is irreversible and we will reinforce it as much as we can.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove has given me the opportunity to say that and that my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East was here to reinforce that message.

Hospitals (London)

10.15 am

Ms Tessa Jowell (Dulwich): I am grateful for the opportunity today to speak about the situation in London's hospitals. We have two contradictory views of reality—that of the Secretary of State for Health and everyone else's. The Secretary of State tells increasingly bewildered and angry Londoners that all is splendid in the national health service; another version is played out, day by day, in the casualty and acute wards of London's hospitals.

I received a letter yesterday from a constituent who is a consultant at Bart's—the hospital which the Secretary of State seems to have a particular mission to close. His letter was written on Wednesday of this week. He says:

> "You may be interested to know that the situation here today has been chaotic. There have been two patients waiting in casualty since Monday afternoon, that is for 40 hours, for beds to become available in the hospital. A further 11 patients were in casualty overnight as there were no beds available for admission to the hospital, and therefore 13 of the 16 casualty trolleys and cubicles were occupied prior to the working day commencing. In fact I visited the department and, as you can imagine, the situation is chaotic. Accident and emergency or casualty departments are not adequately staffed or in fact geared to having in-patients as there are no facilities for this. With regard to hospital admissions today, five out of 10 admissions have had to be cancelled for elective surgery. This includes two of my patients with gynaecological cancer."

Is that what the Secretary of State means about making London better?

Last night I visited four of the major casualty departments in London, and another this morning—five in all. At none of those hospitals—the Whittington, Bart's, St. Thomas's and King's—were any beds available. At King's, 16 patients were waiting to be admitted to the hospital and being nursed or cared for on trolleys. At Bart's a man who was clearly very ill arrived. The hospital had no trolleys and had to throw a mattress on the floor in order to treat him. Every hospital repeats the same story. When I asked the staff, "Has it got worse?" the unanimous answer from every nurse and doctor was, "Yes, it has got worse—much much worse."

What is needed to make it better? The answer is simple. More beds—so that hospitals can admit patients who need to be admitted. It is an irreconcilable contradiction that we have hospitals in London that can perform transplant surgery and give the hope of life to people who, even five years ago, would have been regarded as terminally ill—treatments that are more complex, more advanced than in almost any other part of the western world—yet we cannot guarantee that our hospitals can find a bed in order to admit an elderly lady with a broken arm, who needs to go into hospital only because there is no one at home to look after her.

For patients who wait on trolleys for admission to hospital in the middle of the night, their only hope of being admitted before the following morning—when other patients are discharged—is by filling beds left empty by patients who have died during the night. London hospitals regularly start the night with no empty beds.

None of that chaos has come about by chance; it is the predictable outcome of the Government's being hoodwinked by their own rhetoric—the rhetoric that says that London has too many hospital beds and that market forces will now do what successive Governments, and 20 inquiries into the state of London's hospitals, have so far failed to do. The situation that is now unfolding is entirely the result of Government policy, although the Government are now distancing themselves from it.

Let the Secretary of State tell the people to whom I spoke last night—nurses working in the casualty departments of London hospitals, consultants and the relatives of patients—that London has too many hospital beds. The Government are alone in believing that, when waiting lists lengthen, the answer is to cut the number of beds. That remedy will make matters even worse.

Moreover, Ministers do not even seem to know how many beds, consultants and staff are available, what the waiting times are for each unit and how many beds at any one time are "blocked"—which is the rather unpleasant term used when patients are waiting to be discharged, but are unable to leave the hospital. That information is not held centrally, although it is essential for Ministers to have it if they are to deal with the turmoil that they have created.

What, then, is the actual number of hospital beds in London, and how has the position changed in recent years? In 1986, London had nearly 50,000 acute beds; by 1991—the most recent year for which figures seem to be available—the number had fallen to 36,000, a reduction of more than 14,000. In the rest of the country—comparisons are constantly made with the rest of the country—the rate of closure was 80 beds per million people per year. In London, the rate has been three times as high: 240 beds for every million people close every year. That, too, is a direct result of Government policy, through the operation of the internal market.

[Ms Tessa Jowell]

In his report following the inquiry into London hospitals commissioned by Ministers, Sir Bernard Tomlinson estimated that London needed to lose 2,500 beds. It is not clear where that calculation came from, what was the start date for the closure programme or, indeed, whether that figure has long since been exceeded—which the statistics suggest is very likely. Even Sir Bernard offered a cautionary note, stating:

> "We do not make anywhere in the report the statement that there must be an immediate reduction in beds. We believe there have to be planned reductions in beds to go along with the other changes we have supported."

He offered the following warning:

> "It will be essential that adequate transitional funding be provided to ensure that service changes take place in an orderly fashion. The level of such funding will to a large extent dictate the pace of change. Change that is not managed and funded in this way is likely to be chaotic, and will do serious damage to London's health services, and to its medical research and teaching."

Given what Londoners now confront daily in their hospitals, Sir Bernard's remarks were prophetic. There is nothing planned about the random, chaotic and disruptive closures that are now taking place.

Rigorous and systematic research has been carried out on the required level of hospital beds in London. In April this year, Professor Jarman, of St. Mary's hospital medical school, published an article in the British Medical Journal. He concluded:

> "Hospital admission rates for acute geriatric services for London residents were very similar to the national values in all age groups."

In inner London, acute services showed an admission rate at 22 per cent. above the average value—or the average rate—for the rest of England.

> "However, the admission rate of inner deprived Londoners was 9 per cent. below that of comparable areas outside London. For psychiatry, admission rates in London roughly equalled those in comparable areas. When special health authorities were excluded"—

SHAs will, incidentally, join the market next April—

> "in 1990-91 there were 4 per cent. more acute plus geriatric beds available per resident in London than in England. Bed provision has been reduced more rapidly in London than nationally. Extrapolating the trend of bed closures forward indicates that beds (all and acute) per resident in London are now at about the national average. Data from the Emergency Bed Service indicate that the pressure on available hospital beds in London has been increasing since 1985."

Information from the Emergency Bed Service, which compels emergency admission to hospital by some means or another when hospitals say that they have no beds and cannot admit seriously ill people, is generally regarded as one of the best tests of the adequacy of hospital bed provision in London. Since 1985, the number of admissions of seriously ill people through the service—people who have had to be "refereed" into hospital—has risen threefold.

According to Professor Jarman,

> "Data regarding bed provision and utilisation for all specialties by London residents do not provide a case for reducing the total hospital bed stock in London at a rate faster than elsewhere. Bed closures should take account of London's relatively poorer social and primary health care circumstances, longer hospital waiting lists, poorer provision of residential homes, and the evidence from the Emergency Bed Service . . . higher average costs in London, some unavoidable, are forcing hospital beds to be closed at a faster rate in London than nationally."

In the light of the research evidence provided by Professor Jarman and his colleagues, and the daily experience of the Emergency Bed Service and London hospitals, I shall be interested to hear how the Minister will continue to sustain the case that London has too many hospital beds—given that waiting lists have lengthened, and the number of people waiting for more than two years for treatment has grown.

Waiting lists in London increased by a staggering 19·3 per cent. between June 1992 and August 1993. Within that average for the four Thames regions, there is a disturbing variation from 30·7 per cent. in North East Thames to 4·2 per cent. in South East Thames, with nearly 27,000 patients waiting more than a year for treatment at August 1993.

London's complex problem is made worse by the fact that six out of 10 hospital beds are occupied by elderly people over 65. The difficult relationship between acute care and community care in London must be understood, especially as two policies are heading for a collision. The loss of capacity to care for elderly people in hospital has not been matched by replacement facilities, or continuing care beds, as they are called, in the community—quite the reverse.

The health service has withdrawn, almost wholesale, from long-term care for the elderly. All that care—or virtually all—is now in the private sector, provided by private nursing and residential care homes. Many of my elderly constituents want to be looked after in the part of London in which they grew up and where they have always lived, but the nursing and residential care homes that they need do not exist in Southwark. For them, going into a residential nursing home means moving to Clacton, Bexhill or Eastbourne, many miles from their families and from what has always been their home. National comparisons shows that London has been specifically disadvantaged in that respect. In the rest of the country, about 12 beds are available for every 1,000 people, whereas in London the figure is little more than nine.

The way in which the Government chose to distribute the community care money last year—the special transitional grant—further disadvantaged London. My constituents lost close to £1 million because the Government chose to place the money where the homes rather than the elderly people and the needs were. That combined formula advantaged the parts of the country with large numbers of residential homes, but disadvantaged areas such as inner London where, for obvious reasons, the number of residential homes is very small. The crisis facing London's hospitals cannot, therefore, be separated from the crisis in community care

A consultant at one of the teaching hospitals told me recently that one needs to be very fit if one is leaving hospital at 85 and living in Southwark, Lewisham, Lambeth or any other part of our deprived inner city. The pressure on beds means that many elderly people are not fit when they leave hospital which is why the readmission rates are so disturbingly high. Elderly people may return to poor accommodation. They may live in poverty on a low and inadequate income, having to make daily choices between keeping warm and having enough to eat, and not have the support of relatives.

At King's yesterday, about 68 beds were occupied by people who were regarded as medically fit, but who were unable to leave the hospital because the community care that they needed was not available. Elderly people are often without the support and care at home which would enable them to cope for very long if they left hospital. They therefore stay in hospital in beds which would otherwise be available for other people and so exacerbate the crisis.

Before the Minister leaps to blame local authorities, let me remind him that the Government cannot follow their ideology and have good, working community care. One of the problems has been the straitjacket placed on local authorities in arranging their community care. They are required to spend about 85 per cent. of the money transferred by central Government in the independent sector, so their freedom to arrange what they regard as the best and most appropriate form of care is fettered by a purely ideological stricture placed on them by central Government.

All the headlines that we see almost daily in central London could have been foreseen. We have a lethal combination of the Tomlinson proposals laced with the rather contradictory recommendations of the specialty reviews and topped up with the internal market. The result is chaos, a chaos that keeps the Secretary of State away from the Dispatch Box and out of Marks and Spencer at times when shoppers would be there to confront her.

Sir Bernard Tomlinson said:

> "It would be quite disastrous to let hospitals simply be destroyed piecemeal by market forces. If you are going to have to remove a hospital it has to be done in a planned way over a considerable period of time."

That was his commentary on the aftermath of the impact of his proposals, the Government's reaction and the specialty reviews, his reaction to the chaos that he predicted when his report was published. It is time to ask whether Ministers listen to the advice that they receive or only to take account of what they want to hear.

The King's Fund also established a commission to examine the future of London hospitals. It was similarly concerned about the chaos that is now ensuing. At the end of October, its chief executive, Robert Maxwell, wrote in a letter to The Times:

> "It is now increasingly urgent that ministers announce their main decisions on the London hospitals, in the light of the specialty reviews published in June."

We were promised statements before the end of the year. The written answer that passed for a statement earlier this week scarcely fits the bill.

Robert Maxwell goes on to say that if we are to sort out the problems that have ensued, money must be made available to fund agreed capital and other expenditure, to enable all the changes to happen. He finishes by saying:

> "any business that was undertaking changes on a scale remotely resembling that of the changes that are proposed for the London hospital service would recognise that it simply has to spend more money to bring about the changes and it has to convince its customers and its staff that it knows what it is doing."

This week, the Secretary of State acted by putting her finger in the dyke and stopped University College hospital from going to the wall. In the same breath, however, she announced that Bart's accident and emergency department is to close. The Secretary of State claimed that the statement would bring an end to uncertainty in the health service in that part of London—the statement relating only to north and east London. When will the Secretary of State make a statement in the House of Commons that will end the uncertainty for Londoners throughout London and provide the stability that health services in London so desperately need?

It is interesting that when the Camden and Islington health authority put its purchasing plans in relation to UCH out to public consultation, not a single person replied in support of its proposals.

Let us compare two conflicting situations. When it appeared that the internal market would close UCH down after the threatened withdrawal of contracts by the Camden and Islington health authority, because it said that it could find cheaper treatment elsewhere, Ministers intervened. Contrast that with the situation in Dulwich that faces my constituents and hundreds of constituents of other hon. Members, where the renal unit at King's is threatened by the recommendations of the specialty review, not because it is not to use the Government's terms, "commercially successful", but because it is in the wrong place, according to the cursory appraisal of the renal specialty review.

Staff working in the renal unit were informed of the likely outcome for south London's renal services before the review team had made any visit or taken any evidence. The provisional decision to move the unit to St. George's hospital has been taken, therefore, without what, locally, is felt to be any recognition of the excellent service offered at King's, Dulwich. It is not a line with which the patients of the kidney unit at Dulwich agree. The patients have raised about £1 million for the refurbishment of the kidney unit; they know what an excellent service they receive. They have a sense of security, knowing that the unit provides dialysis as well as transplant where necessary. They are people who are chronically ill, many of whom have moved to be near the hospital. It is their lifeline. The proposal to move the unit tampers with the rawest feelings and anxieties in those patients' lives. Tampered with is what those patients feel. On Monday, I shall go with a deputation of patients and staff to Downing street with their petition, asking the Prime Minister to listen; asking the Prime Minister to be persuaded by the 25,000 signatures asking that the successful renal unit be allowed to remain at King's.

There is a broad consensus about the need to improve health care for Londonders. However, the need to reduce the number of beds further is completely unproven and indeed, as I have already indicated, is refuted by the available systematic evidence. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will accept that there is a crying need for the standard of primary care in London to be improved. Virtually nothing has been achieved in the 11 years since the Aitchison report, which was specifically about standards of primary care in London, was published.

It is not a simple equation, however, that improvements in primary care lead eventually and inexorably to a reduced demand for hospital places. Improved primary and community services would mean that patients who are in King's and other London hospitals waiting for discharge, would be able to leave, but the evidence rather contradicts the declining need for hospital beds; it suggests that better primary care means that people go to their doctors earlier and are treated earlier, and that the demand on hospital services actually increases.

Secondly, we do not know to what extent the particularly deprived conditions in inner London will act as a brake on demands on hospital services. The extent to which the work done in hospitals can be done as safely and effectively in the community remains to be seen.

The impact of new medical technologies is also uncertain, but I hope that the Government will maintain an open mind. I hope that they will look at the evidence, first, that better primary care increases demand instead of reducing it and, secondly, that there is no certainty that the number of beds in London can be reduced further, and especially not reduced in anticipation of those long-heralded improvements in primary care.

There is also evidence, from the purchasing authority in my part of south-east London, that about 30 per cent. of the Tomlinson money that is being made available is being used simply to keep existing services going.

In conclusion, I shall leave some important questions with the Minister. The Government are devoted to the market as their means for distributing health care. The market will always choose the cheapest treatment, but there is no equivalence between the cheapest care and the best care.

What guarantees and monitors will there be of the quality of the contracts that are now being taken up by hospitals outside London which were previously placed with the specialist hospitals? What guarantee will the Minister offer patients, whose care is transferred to those hospitals, that their chances of recovery, their life expectancy and the quality of treatment that they receive will not in any way be compromised as a result of the change?

Is it true that the rate of success of heart bypass operations at Bart's is better than anywhere else? If so, is that successful unit to close? If so, what similar guarantees of excellence will the Minister offer patients whose treatment is transferred elsewhere? What guarantees will the Minister offer to parents whose babies are delivered very prematurely and do not go to a highly specilised neonatal unit, but to a special-care baby unit in their own areas?

Quality of care means people get better. What auditing of quality will Ministers undertake? Are the Government really set on making London better or are they simply set on making London's health service cheaper? Are they really concerned to provide a health service which everyone in London will use or is London's health service to become a service only for the poor and those who have no choice?

I will finish the words of a member of staff in an accident and emergency unit that I visited last night. When she looked at the line of people waiting on trolleys that were touching each other, she said, "I just don't know what I'd do if one of those people was my mother." Are those the kind of standards that the Government believe are fair and proper to apply to the health care of everyone who lives in London and uses London's health service?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate the hon. Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) on raising the subject. In particular, I commend her for her visits to various hospitals yesterday. I should like to comment generally on her points. If she will excuse me, I will consider the possibility of responding to her in writing on some of the specifics. However, I have a few minutes in which to comment on the points that she has raised.

As the hon. Lady is aware, the Tomlinson report is one of many reports that have identified the number of hospitals in London and the number of sites on which acute services are delivered. The Tomlinson report stated that there is, and will continue to be, over capacity in London in many specialties. That is a difficult situation and one which Health Ministers have faced for a long time. However, when the hon. Lady said that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health had a particular mission to close Bart's, she does my right hon. Friend an injustice.

If the hon. Member for Dulwich believes that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State enjoys having to recommend the reduction of acute services in some hospitals and the concentration on to fewer sites, with all the worry and disruption which that would cause potentially—and certainly worry in the short term in many people's minds—the hon. Lady seriously misjudges her.

The problem is very difficult and it must be handled with great care. That is precisely what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is doing. The hon. Lady will be aware that a great deal of time has already elapsed since the publication of the Tomlinson report. We have been extremely careful to assess all the possibilities. Many learned people from London and elsewhere have put together the reviews of different specialties and all the options so that we do not rush into decisions which we will regret later.

The hon. Member for Dulwich referred to accident and emergency units because she has visited them. I am aware that there are problems with some A and E units. I am aware of the current problems with regard to emergency admissions not just in London, but all over the country. For many reasons, including this winter's flu epidemic, emergency admissions have risen sharply and that is placing extreme pressure on A and E units and other hospital departments.

I remind the hon. Member for Dulwich that there are a number of major schemes in London to upgrade A and E departments. The hon. Lady will be aware of the scheme at King's in her constituency. She will also be aware of the £25 million development at the Homerton which involves considerable upgrading of A and E facilities. She will also be aware of proposals—not yet confirmed—to make improvements at the Whittington which she also visited last night. We are aware of the increasing demand and of why, for a whole series of reasons not all of which can be addressed quickly or in the short term, we need better and upgraded A and E facilities in London and elsewhere.

The hon. Member for Dulwich referred to the argument about numbers of beds. That is a long-term view of what will be needed in the years to come in respect of acute beds. While we may argue about different hospitals and numbers at different places, I remind the hon. Lady that there are certain fundamentals that mean that we will need fewer acute beds. Those fundamentals include the fact that developments are being made——

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Sackville: I do not have time to give way if I am to make a sensible response.

Provision is being made outside London for many specialties where previously it was necessary for people to travel to London. An example of that is the very impressive oncology centre in Maidstone. Many local people in the area who would otherwise have been treated in London, will now be treated near their homes. The hon. Lady might like to visit that facility to put the problem in perspective. She might like to talk to the staff there and discover what they are achieving. That facility will have an effect on provision in south-east London.

The increase in day surgery is another enormous factor. The hon. Lady will be aware that day surgery accounts for about 25 per cent. of operations in this country. That figure is heading towards 50 per cent. in America. I have opened many day surgery units around the country over the past year and a half. Day surgery will have an enormous effect on demand for in-patient acute beds.

It is absolutely right that, where possible, people should be treated within a day and then return to their own homes. There is nothing to be gained by unnecessary stays in hospital. There have been enormous advances in the efficient use of theatres and in-patient surgical beds. That is also having an effect on future demand. We must consider a 10 or 20-year period when deciding the real need in future. Therefore, we must take all those trends into account in our current plans.

As the hon. Lady is aware, there has also been a decline in the population of parts of inner London as there has been in most of our inner cities. That must have an effect on hospital provision. As people move out to the suburbs or other areas, they will quite rightly want to be treated close to where they live.

The hon. Lady said that the Government are alone in the view that we must make these changes. We are not. The King's Fund report is very clear and, in many ways, is even more radical than the Tomlinson report in its view of future provision. The main burden of the letter that the hon. Lady read out was that we had to get on and take decisions. The recent announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was the first of such announcements which must be made about our response to the Tomlinson inquiry.

Many professionals in London and elsewhere are acutely aware of the enormous subsidy to London health care from the rest of the country. They are aware of how much of the funding of the national health service is spent in London. We have to try to restore the balance to some degree.

Yesterday, an article in a national newspaper said:

> "No one likes shutting hospitals, but 20 reports going back 100 years have documented the surplus supply of hospital beds in London . . . inner London has 70 per cent. more beds than the national average and twice as many consultants. Closures have not kept pace with the falling population . . . yesterday's decision"— it was made earlier this week—

> "makes sense."

That was not The Daily Telegraph or The Times—it was certainly not the Evening Standard—it was The Guardian.

UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs

10.59 am

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Perhaps six weeks ago, Mr. Jan Eliasson, Deputy Secretary-General of the United Nations with special responsibility for humanitarian affairs, resigned. His resignation became public immediately, although it will not take effect until the end of January 1994. It is a matter of such importance that I believe strongly that it should be marked by a rigorous analysis in this Chamber of the reasons for Mr. Eliasson's resignation, of the genesis of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs itself—a very recent part of the United Nations—and of the way forward, because of the value of the department in helping the neediest of the needy worldwide.

The start of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs was perhaps the Gulf war and the tragedies that lay in its wake, with the uprisings in the north and south of Iraq against the great dictator Saddam Hussein. At a G7 meeting in Houston in May 1991, the Department of Humanitarian Affairs was suggested and set up. Its purpose was to scrutinise the humanitarian work of the agencies of the United Nations, to increase the accountability of those agencies, and to bring transparency of operation to their role.

How was the structure proposed? It was planned that there would be the classic pyramid structure and that the department would have a direction role, that the agencies would, in effect, report to the department, and that the department would direct their work. On the location of the new department, it was suggested that, for policy, it had to be in New York. However, Geneva is the humanitarian capital of the world, so it had to be there as well.

The House quite properly endorsed the creation of the new department. In early-day motion 538 in January 1992, the House welcomed

> "the appointment of a single humanitarian aid co-ordinator by the United Nations who shall have the authority to deal with governments that deny assistance to suffering peoples, and those that use humanitarian relief for political ends".

I am afraid that the wording was just wishful thinking. Indeed, to see the real way in which the department was in fact set up, we need to look at the General Assembly resolution of 30 October 1992, the general overview of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, the 47th session agenda item No. 37, the report of the Secretary-General entitled > "Strengthening of the co-ordination of humanitarian and emergency assistance of the United Nations".

It is an important document, in which the Secretary-General tells us:

> "New demands for emergency humanitarian assistance underline the need to assess the scope of international response and continue to refine the modalities for co-ordinating it. The establishment of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) was designed to strengthen a co-ordinated and coherent system-wide approach."

He goes on to tell us:

> "The new Department was staffed through the redeployment of resources, combining the former Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Coordinator (UNDRO) in Geneva with other existing capacities within the United Nations. The Department, both in New York and Geneva, is also supported by seconded staff made available by the World Food Programme . . . by . . . (UNICEF), by the Office of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees . . . and the . . . (UNDP)."

The Secretary-General stated:

[Miss Emma Nicholson]

> "The secondment has enabled the Department to benefit from the experiences of these organisations in its day-to-day work, thus enhancing its capacity to coordinate and to achieve a system-wide approach in response to emergency situations."

The Foreign Affairs Select Committee also reported on the DHA. Its report for the Session of 1992-93, ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on 23 June 1993, entitled "The Expanding Role of the United Nations and its Implications for United Kingdom Policy", suggests:

> "The old constraints . . . against interference in matters which are "essentially" domestic are no longer accepted. The change is a very recent one and has occurred in response to two very different emergencies: in Somalia and in Iraq after the Gulf War. Decisions to intervene militarily on humanitarian grounds have not been taken according to a clear set of guiding principles, but in response to sudden emergencies. The UN has not so intervened in other humanitarian disasters of perhaps comparable scale—such as that in Sudan."

The report goes on:

> "Better criteria, which are internationally accepted, need to be drawn up to determine the circumstances in which armed intervention for humanitarian purposes is acceptable."

Earlier, the report talks about the need for intervention and about the way in which the United Nations has responded through the formation of the DHA.

On a critical matter, the Foreign Affairs Select Committee made the critical statement:

> "Perhaps the most complex and difficult problem with which the UN is currently grappling is this: under what circumstances is humanitarian intervention by the international community justified?"

The report goes on to state correctly:

> "the number and diversity of humanitarian crises have increased sharply over the past few years and enhanced media coverage has heightened public awareness of the suffering involved and increase expectations of the abilities of governments and of the UN to respond. Not only are there more concurrent crises, they are becoming more complex, with civil conflict inextricably linked with the need for humanitarian assistance . . . Humanitarian intervention does not always . . . involve use of the military . . . It has happened to protect aid convoys . . . distribute food directly . . . to protect areas designated as safe havens or safe areas (as in Iraq and now in Bosnia) and to help rebuild a civil society (as in Somalia)."

Since May 1991, therefore, a new United Nations department has existed in response to the need that a Select Committee discussed and reported on eight or nine months after its inception by the Secretary-General in the General Assembly report. The problems, however, were clear from the very beginning. Indeed, as I read out those statements, it could be seen that they conflicted at once, that the expectations that the creation of the new department brought with it were immediately thrown up in sharp relief against the actual support that the G7 countries and other members of the United Nations gave its new child.

If we look, for example, at the problems of structure, we can see immediately that to have such a new department split up already into two places gave a management problem of large proportions. If we look at the siting of other United Nations humanitarian agencies, we can also see at once that Geneva is undoubtedly the humanitarian capital of the world.

Geneva is home to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Mrs. Ogata, a truly remarkable person, leads UNHCR, with an annual budget of $1·2 billion. Geneva is naturally the site of the International Committee of the Red Cross. It is also home to the Federation of the Red Cross and Red Cross Societies. The World Health Organisation is in Geneva. So is the International Labour Organisation. The World Food Programme, which I have already mentioned, is only down the road in Rome. It is left to the United Nations Children's Fund and the United Nations Development Programme among the major aid agencies of the United Nations to be based in New York.

Therefore, at once it can be seen that there is inter-agency competition, if only for attention. But, of course, competition goes much further than that. Funds are scarce always, even for the best of purposes—humanitarian purposes. Therefore, the budgetary problems needed to be addressed at once if the new department was to be successful. The appropriate budgets were not forthcoming. The DHA was given a very modest budget indeed, and a small number of staff. It has been noted already that those staff were drawn from other agencies.

The underpinning of the funding needed to make the department a success was not thus provided. As the department straddled the globe, or at any rate the Atlantic, core operating budgets were needed and were not forthcoming. The staff of the DHA in Geneva have worked immensely hard in mobilising expenditure funding.

Here I pay a special tribute to Mr. Gerhard Putnam Cramer, who is head of the Geneva office with special responsibility for Iraq. He and his staff mobilised $1 billion for Iraq alone for the United Nations agencies to spend. But that is not funding that belongs to the DHA. It is funding that he and his staff have managed to attract through diligent hard work for the United Nations agencies to spend in Iraq—generally in northern Iraq.

Indeed, the modality of the operating programme under the leadership of Mr. Putnam Cramer is excellent. The operating promgrammes in the field in Iraq alone at the practical level have been exemplary. Daily meetings have been co-ordinated with all the agencies involved in northern Iraq.

Within a short time, the DHA has made its mark in many areas of the world. Programme work has been carried out already and is continuing in the horn of Africa, southern Africa, Somalia, Mozambique, Angola and Luangwa, for example. In addition, thematic issues have been addressed. The department has responsibility for United Nations reaction to natural disasters. It has taken over responsibility for relief co-ordination from the United Nations Disaster Relief Organisation. It has the overriding responsibility for United Nations action in disaster prevention and mitigation, and for de-mining.

What a programme. What a responsibility. Surely carefully designed terms of reference are needed to carry out such a vast programme. Not only does the new department have to attract funding to support itself and for its organisations—the agencies of the United Nations—to spend, but it must offer sensitive support and strong leadership to those agencies. I believe that the true weakness of the United Nations is reflected in the fact that the correct and proper terms of reference for the DHA were not created. The G7 gave birth to the new department, which was a wonderful concept, but did not support it properly.

When the responsibility was given to Dr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali in the totality of his overall United Nations responsibility, he did not give the DHA full and proper support, either. Thus, the 100 staff in Geneva and the 50 staff in New York who make up the 150 full-time staffing of the DHA, have been left without leadership or proper terms of reference to fulfil their massive and crucial task.

My first conclusion this morning has to be that Mr. Jan Eliasson is the victim of that lack of will and managerial effectiveness within the United Nations. The role of the DHA was not properly defined. Mr. Eliasson, the key architect of resolution 36182 which created the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, has been the victim of a lack of practical support by the leading officials of the United Nations.

In the wake of the Gulf war, Prince Sadruddin Aga Khan, the special rapporteur for human rights in Iraq, resigned because of the enormous difficulties of trying to affect positively humanitarian matters inside Iraq. Now we have the resignation of Mr. Jan Eliasson, whose task was co-ordination, management and direction and who attempted a hands-on policy to effect the necessary resolution of the conflicts and the reconstruction of human rights in Iraq and other places.

I therefore felt that it was of large importance to discuss this important matter today. I wish to take as a critical example of the need for the DHA, the work that it has carried out in Iraq. I give once more a summary of the background. I take it from the United Nations inter-agency humanitarian programme in Iraq co-operation programme document for 1 April 1993 to 31 March 1994. The background statement says:

> "The United Nations Department of Humanitarian Affairs has continued to provide coordination of the Humanitarian Programme in Iraq through the Inter-Agency Relief Coordination Unit in Baghdad and the Special Unit for Iraq in Geneva. Since October 1993, IRCU has expanded its role by providing stronger field coordination in the north through field delegates located in Arbil, Dohuk and Suleimaniyah."

Mr. Putnam Cramer, under Mr. Jan Eliasson, gave us the implementation report of 1993, when he laid out for us the ways in which various agencies under his co-ordination had delivered their aid. I commend that work and those two reports to the House.

I have already displayed to the House the difficulties that the new department has faced and the ways in which it has not been strengthened or supported, tasked correctly or supported by proper terms of reference to enable it to fulfil the role that was laid out for it. Perhaps I should turn for a moment to the need for the department to continue, to be properly strengthened and co-ordinated and to have a proper budget. We know that it is always very easy for non-governmental organisations and similar United Nations outgrowths to spring up without proper need.

Indeed, it could be said that, with the resignation of Mr. Eliasson, we should accept that the move of the G7 in May 1991 has failed, and that perhaps the new department is not needed. Perhaps that is why it has essentially failed to attract and gain the support that it says it needs. I think not.

Permit me to spend a few moments considering the need, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Just a few days ago, on 13 December, the European Parliament passed on the nod a resolution on human rights violations by the Iraqi Government against the Iraqi Shi'ites. The draft resolution reads:

> "The European Parliament
> Appalled by the findings of Max van der Stoel, the UN Special Rapporteur for Iraq, in his latest rapport, on the continued Attacks on the Marsh Arabs,
> Drawing attention to the Special Rapporteur's statements that the Government of Iraq is responsible for continuing indiscriminate shelling of civilian settlements on a large scale, despite the creation of a no fly zone by the coalition powers on the basis of UN Security Council Resolution 688,
> Drawing attention to the Special Rapporteur's statement that the Iraqi Government by various measures is denying the marsh dwellers access to food and health care,
> Drawing attention to the Special Rapporteur's conclusion that the Government of Iraq is responsible for the draining of the marshes and so for the consequent destruction of the traditional ways of life of the indigenous people,
> Points out that this drainage is detrimental to the environment of the marshes and has a negative impact on the neighbouring regions,
> Points out that the findings of the Rapporteur are in line with the report of Middle East Watch,
> Considers this action by the Iraqi authorities a flagrant violation of its international obligations,
> Taking into account that due to these actions thousands of Shia's have fled to Iran where they live in refugee camps in extremely poor conditions,
> Recalling its previous resolutions on the subject,
> Calls upon the Council in the framework of the Common foreign and security policy of the EU to take all necessary steps which might bring an end to these murderous campaigns by the Iraqi Government,
> Warns that further delay in bringing these atrocities to a halt might cause an escalation of violence in the region,
> Urges the Commission to provide emergency aid to the refugees in Iran and use all possible means to send food and medical supplies to the people in the marsh lands,
> Sees as one of the conditions to lift the international boycott against Iraq the fact that all actions against the Marsh People should be stopped,
> Requests its President to transmit this resolution to the Council, the Commission, the members of the UN Security Council and the Government of Iraq."

The very fact that that resolution was passed on the nod surely displays the European Community's understanding of the deliberate destruction of the south of Iraq.

I shall now mention the north, and I am indebted to the Kurdish Information Centre in London, which yesterday sent me its new year appeal for action on Kurdistan. The letter reads:

> "Dear Emma Nicholson . . . We are writing to you to request your urgent support in raising attention once again . . . What appears as a peaceful situation to the outside world is far from being so.
> The main threat is firstly still posed by the Iraqi Government which maintains a constant military presence just a few kilometres away from most of the main centres of habitation. Attacks are still feared and Saddam's agents keep the people living in suspense by carrying out bomb attacks in public places.
> The second threat comes from the Turkish Government's control of the only open border into the Kurdish region, which is the lifeline for all supplies coming in. The Turkish Government is frequently imposing difficult conditions on the Kurdish Administration in exchange for keeping the route open. For example, asking the Kurdish Administration to assist them in their war with their own Kurds, leading to Kurds from Iraq being forced to fight Kurds from Turkey against their will . . . It is very well known that the Turkish Government is no friend of the Kurdish people, as it is destroying Kurdish villages and massacring the people. In Turkey there are no rights for persons who claim Kurdish origin . . . There is the extraordinary difficulty caused by the fact that Kurdistan is still subject to the UN embargo because it is a part of Iraq . . . The Iraqi regime is refusing to allow any electricity to be supplied to the entire governate of Dohuk, where the people have been without power supply since August this year. Although the power is actually generated from the Kurdish region . . . it is routed through government controlled areas. It can be supplied directly by installing local supply stations. This is not costly, but it is currently impossible due to the embargo.".

I must again put on record a fact that I have mentioned to the House for many months. Most international aid for Iraq—most of that aid is for Kurdistan—is routed through

[Miss Emma Nicholson]

Baghdad, and 95 per cent. of it is benefiting Baghdad and not the Iraqi people who depend on it. The Iraqi Government profiteers on the exchange rate and a huge amount of money is being lost by the aid agencies, including the UN and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, in that way. That is a most important point.

I shall now move from the north to the south, and remind the House of the terrible situation of the Iraqi Shi'ites.

The marshlands of southern Iraq, as a unique habitat, are ceasing to exist. Perhaps within a few weeks, that damage could be irreversible. They have been drained in an exercise that has used civil engineering as a weapon of environmental terrorism. An eco-system that dates back to biblical times will soon cease to exist and the implications will feed through to the ecological systems of Europe and western Asia. The damage to wild life is incalculable—an area larger than the state of New Jersey is being made a quagmire of stinking mud.

Prince Charles has called that > "an utterly inhuman policy of cultural genocide."

Those were his words in his introduction to the leaflet of the appeal by AMAR, Assisting Marsh Arabs and Refugees, an humanitarian aid agency which I chair, more than a year ago.

I remind the House that Saddam Hussein has diverted almost the entire flow of the Euphrates into a large drainage canal, known as the third river. Earlier this year, the UN human rights commissioner, special investigator Max van der Stoel, stated that two thirds of the water which normally flowed into the marshes had been prevented from doing so. That work has continued since his report. I have visited the area several times since it was written, and 80 or 90 per cent. of the water may now have gone and the people cannot live without water.

I remind the House that the International Wild Fowl and Wetlands Research Bureau believes that the marshlands are the most important wintering site for migrating birds from western Eurasia. The habitat has supported several million birds a year. By the end of this year, and certainly by the beginning of next, it will have disappeared into history.

The effects on the people have been devastating. Perhaps the House recalls that Wilfred Thesiger wrote a wonderful book called "The Marsh Arabs" and introduced the English-reading nations of the world to their way of life. They have been almost wholly destroyed. It is not merely their environment and their habitat that have been destroyed: the marsh Arabs as a people have been destroyed, because, without water, no human being can exist.

Thousands of marsh Arabs and other refugees have fled to Iran. Millions have been killed or imprisoned throughout the south of Iraq, which has suffered continuing bombardment and an increase in assaults of all types, including chemical weapons. The evidence given by myself and others to the United Nations on chemical weapon assaults led to a mission to Iran and the Iraqi marshlands, but it will be some months before we see the results of that.

It is difficult to prove that chemical weapons have been used anywhere. We were slow to accept that they had been used in Kurdistan in 1988 and even slower to recognise that they had been used in Iran in the early 1980s in the Iran-Iraq war. Subsequent conclusions by eminent scientists proved to them that chemical weapons had been used. Events that will come to light in the south of Iraq will prove conclusively that chemical weapons are continually used by Saddam Hussein's forces as normal weapons. Other nations that adhere to the 1925 Geneva convention do not use such weapons in that way.

The plight of the people in southern Iraq has for many years been abominable. Recently, the House was good enough to allow me to stage an exhibition from the AMAR appeal archives of the past two years. We showed photographs of the plight of the people and our most senior doctor, Dr. Al-Hariri came to speak. The exhibition was opened by my noble Friend Baroness Chalker, and the British Government have been generous and kind in enabling the AMAR appeal group to try to support survivors who have entered Iran.

The European Community has been wonderful in helping us to assist those still surviving in the marshes and on the borders. Dr. Al-Hariri, Dr. Mussawi and Dr. Amin, the three most important members of the AMAR appeal medical team in Iran, spoke to us, and I should like to quote from Dr. Al-Hariri's speech:

> "Iraq has suffered a lot under the aggressive regime of Saddam in the last 27 years. We Iraqis will never forget the bitter experience of what happened in Iraq. We have lived through the tragic era of Saddam's rule, we have witnessed the suffering and devastation of the two destructive wars. When we tell about the intimidation and torture that has happened in Iraq, nobody can believe. In Iraq one can be executed for his political or religious belief. Large numbers of people have met the same fate because they have refused to be involved in the past in the two destructive wars. The heart-rending view of manslaughter in our country will never be forgotten. Complete villages have been wiped out from the map in a short time because they said no to Saddam's rule."

What has happened in the marshlands is the most recent and perhaps the most horrible thing of all. Dr. Al-Hariri said:

> "He has violated the environment not only in Iraq . . . all the world witnessed what he did in Kuwait, now in the marshlands against his own people."

What has happened has been a disaster of unparalleled proportions. Dr. Al-Hariri said:

> "What happened in the marsh was really a disaster, an event that caused great harm and damage to the environment and to humanity. Half a million people have had their water turned off. The place in which they have been surviving for more than 6,000 years has been dried out. This will lead to the extinction of a civilisation that has existed almost untouched for centuries. The drying out of water means the end of these people. Saddam will do everything in order to stay in power. He will not hesitate to kill all the Iraqi people if that will allow him to stay in power."

Iraq is now facing destruction and the sanctions affect the poor people because Saddam will not use his power to give them food and medicine. Dr. Al-Hariri says:

> "The intimidation, the artillery, firing at random at villages and people, setting villages and farms on fire, polluting the environment, launching operations of mass arrest and deportation by forces have led his people to flee the area. They have been forced . . . to leave everything behind if they have left alive. They have been forced to leave everything behind, to leave a place and a civilisation that they have lived in for the last 6,000 years. Those new victims of Saddam Hussein came to the border of Iran in a miserable way. They were . . . suffering epidemics of diseases . . . polluted was all that they had to drink. Their survival was only a matter of chance."

I now believe that Saddam Hussein is in serious trouble. United Nations sanctions are biting, the Iraqi dinar has plunged to an historic low, and the butcher of Baghdad has embarked on the slaughter of Takriti kinsmen who underpin the security of his regime. It is surely a measure of the Iraqi dictator's insecurity that, for the first time, he has started to pick on members of his own tribe, one of the country's four sources of power. The others are the army, the Iraqi branch of the Ba'ath party, and the internal security apparatus.

In western countries, people and politicians niggle about the intrusion of the media, but in the context of the destruction of southern Iraq and the marshlands and of the horrors continually perpetrated in the north of Iraq in Kurdistan, I have nothing but praise for members of the press and of television and radio who have consistently tried to do the almost impossible—to bring out the news.

Shyam Bhatia of The Observer made an epic and historic journey, risking grave personal suffering and danger in the marshes nearly a year ago. Reporters from The Sunday Times have also been consistent in trying to trace stories in a different way. Managing editor Michael Williams has kept his attention focused on this important matter. The BBC has been especially remarkable. Recently, two senior people from its evening news team came with me to southern Iraq and to southern Iran.

However, all our advocacy is not enough, and if we are to help these people in Iraq and other places, we must look to the future of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the United Nations and to the major UN agencies. UNICEF has just published a book entitled "The State of the World's Children 1994", which shows that, in recent years, significant progress has been made against some of the major threats to the health and well being of the world's children.

Social goals reflecting the possibility of reducing child malnutrition, disease, disability and illiteracy show that such ills could be drastically reduced by the year 2000, and those goals have been agreed by a majority of the world's political leaders. Experience shows that national progress in health, nutrition and education depends not on economic development alone but on sustained commitment to improve the well-being of the poor.

Despite the great generosity of the European Community, its peoples and its Governments, and the people of other countries, only a small proportion of international aid is devoted to nutrition, primary health care, basic education, safe water supplies and family planning. It is clear that if we concentrated on those important goals, the state of the world's children would vastly improve.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to ponder thoughtfully and carefully on the problems of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs. I pay special tribute to Mr. Eliasson, who has made his mark. I ask my hon. Friend to examine some of the difficulties that the department has faced in its first two and a half years—the lack of co-ordination, and in controlling its field operations in Iraq through Baghdad.

Those are tough political issues, but if they can be addressed positively, our Government should be a leader —if not the leader, because of our country's experience —in improving the state of the world's children internationally. Rescuing child and adult victims in Iraq could still be within our grasp.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): This is an important subject, but this cannot be said to be a particularly full House. It does not do justice to the seriousness of the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson). It reminds me that, when I began my maiden speech, I found myself addressing three hon. Members. When I ended, only the Speaker and myself were in the Chamber. On this occasion, at least there is an hon. Member on the Labour Front Bench, together with a Whip—my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes)—to hear what must be a brief winding-up speech.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West not just for her speech today but for all her work in drawing attention to humanitarian tragedies that beset the world, and particularly for her work—often at first hand—in drawing world attention to the plight of marsh Arabs in southern iraq.

Unfortunately, we live in a world in which the number and complexity of humanitarian disasters are increasing in scale. We have not only our normal share of natural disasters—drought, famine, earthquakes—but a number of deep-rooted political and unresolved ethnic conflicts, human rights abuses, and so on. They all create vast numbers of refugees and people displaced in their own country.

Money alone cannot solve those problems. They require huge political effort and co-ordination between all the agencies and non-governmental organisations involved. I think sometimes that we ask too much of the United Nations. We expect it to be the world's development authority, foreign affairs Ministry and, in some cases, Ministry of defence. It cannot take on all those tasks across the globe. However, we must do our best at local and international level.

The founding of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs described so well by my hon. Friend was an important initiative. It was established two years ago, largely in response to an initiative by Britain and Germany, and led to United Nations General Assembly resolution 46/182. Despite some disappointments and mistakes made by many people, the Department has been a force for good, and we will certainly not withdraw our support from its concept.

Whoever is appointed to take on the role vacated by Mr. Eliasson will have our support, and I hope that the right man or woman can be found. The job specification is daunting. The appointee must have a knowledge of humanitarian concerns and be a substantial and respected figure on the world stage, and must also be an effective manager of the agencies and financial resources that many Governments are committing to the problem.

The aims of the British Government and of the United Nations can be summed up in the observation that we all want humanitarian aid to be provided quickly, to the right people, and on a cost-effective basis that avoids waste and misappropriation. That last point is important, because if that is not done, humanitarian efforts risk being discredited. Any story of scandal and duplication undermines in the mind of the public the very aims that we are pursuing.

I pay particular tribute to the efforts of my hon. Friend in Iraq, and emphasise her remark that responsibility for the continuing suffering there lies with Saddam Hussein and with no one else.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I draw your attention to what I consider to be an abuse of the procedures of the House in the answering of written questions. I put down a question to a Home Office Minister after the Police Federation, to which I am a parliamentary adviser, received the information that the number of officers in the Metropolitan police area was reduced by more than 400 in the first eight months of this year.

The Home Office replied that it would answer in a letter, which will presumably reach me after the House adjourns for the Christmas recess. Should not the House be provided with such serious information in a written answer in Hansard, rather than in a letter?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The content of answers has nothing to do with the Chair.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Has the Chair received any indication from the President of the Board of Trade that a statement will be made this morning on the Stock Exchange announcement just made by British Gas about a a major restructuring that will possibly involve the loss of 20,000 jobs and the elimination of the regional tiers of management of British Gas Scotland and British Gas Wales?

The House has been awaiting a statement from the President of the Board of Trade in response to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission inquiry, which has apparently been delayed a number of times—as recently as this week. If British Gas has gone ahead with its restructuring, that would indicate that it knows the content of the President's announcement before the House, or does not know the content but does not care two hoots. May inquiries be made to establish whether there is any vestige of influence left over that powerful, over-mighty company?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is not aware of any such information, but no doubt the hon. Gentleman's remarks will be noted by the occupants of the Government Front Bench.

Arable Aid

11.47 am

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I apologise to the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland for delaying his Christmas holiday and mine, but I offer no apology for raising this important subject. The short Adjournment debate on the issue three weeks ago raised more questions than it provided answers, so it is important to examine again a matter that affects the entire Scottish agricultural industry and similar industries.

The Minister must be aware of widespread anger and anxiety at the effect of his Department's attitudes and actions. I have been a Member of Parliament a long time, but I have never experienced lobbying as extensive as that relating to this subject by not only farmers but representatives of all the ancillary industries, who came to the House to express their great concern and request that the Minister change his mind and take appropriate action.

This is not a party political issue. It is an agricultural matter first, as is signified by the presence in the Chamber of the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), who supports the agricultural industry's plea to the Minister, and of the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), representing the view of the Labour party. All parties are telling the Minister that something must be done —that he should listen to the industry's arguments and produce action that allows it a level playing field in the European context.

There is genuine and continuing anger about this. It is not good enough for the Minister to say that nothing can be done, that it is all settled and that he is stuck with EC rules and cannot do anything about it, or that the statistics involved in calculating the base area are immutable and unchangeable. That is not good enough, because the industry genuinely feels let down and discriminated against on that issue. It is an issue which simply will not go away. Nor can it be swept under the carpet or ignored by the Government. By its very nature, the base area and the set aside problem will recur year by year and, unless changes are made, will be a cumulative problem and burden on the industry.

The purpose of the debate is to allow the Governnment to explain more fully the basis of their actions and get to the truth regarding the base area situation. I know that the Minister feels that he has been misunderstood and that false statistics have been used. This is his opportunity to get the record straight. What cannot be disputed is that the 5·4 set aside penalty being imposed on the industry will cost the industry dear unless something is done to alleviate the situation.

The industry is concerned about the direct consequences of such a Scottish set aside penalty. More than 20 per cent. of arable land in the main grain-growing areas will be set aside next year despite output having declined by some 20 per cent. this year. If the policy is carried out, I am told that Scottish farm incomes will probably fall by about £20 million as a direct consequence. Producers' net margins could drop by up to 57 per cent. The increased set aside is likely to hit the spring barley crop in particular, reducing production by about 300,000 tonnes. Those are the concerns of the industry and I hope that the Minister will react and provide a solution to them.

I am told that users of Scottish grain, especially maltsters, distillers and oat millers will have to source a sizeable proportion of their requirements outside of Scotland. That is a crazy situation for our industry to be in. The lost acreage will reduce the turnover of Scottish merchants and co-operatives by £33 million, which includes lost sales of £3·5 million in seed, £2·5 million in fertiliser and about £1·4 million in agrochemicals.

Unless it is changed, the consequences of the decision will reverberate throughout the whole of the farming industry and its ancillary industries. For example, the haulage industry reckons that lorry movements will be reduced by about 13,000 trips. That means lost opportunity, lost income and lost job opportunities unless something is done. That is the general picture, but it also applies in individual cases. A farmer in Angus said to me:

> "On this farm it means a loss of income of £5,000 for 1993-94, makes it uneconomical to retain my one employee and involves a 36 per cent. increase in my set-aside area for 1994. This is on a typical 320 acre arable farm"

Both globally and specifically, the measure can be damaging to the industry unless action is taken.

The Government cannot simply wash their hands of that responsibility. Nor can they ignore the genuine anger and fears throughout Scotland's agriculture and ancillary industries. The agriculture industry has a right to expect the Minister to defend its interests when it is facing such financial problems. It now looks for an urgent political response. If action is required in Europe, action must be taken in Europe to defend one of Scotland's fundamental and crucial economic interests.

The Minister has said that the "base areas are correct", and that there is "no discrepancy whatsoever" in the statistics. He is sure that the overshoot is "a real one".

I should like to challenge those assertions, because they have been at the root of the Government's inaction in the face of this crisis situation. The Minister believes the data to be unshakable, but two sets of data were used to calculate the set-aside base area: the June census returns and the set-aside payments made. The base area for Scotland was worked out using actual set-aside payment figures and was not based on the June census returns.

While England is better off by some 11 per cent. using the actual rather than the census figures, Scotland is 140 per cent. worse off. The Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department must have known that. Yet as late as November 1993, the Department was using two sets of data, despite the fact that it knew in the summer of 1992 that the base area calculation was to be on 1989-90 and 1991. Yet it made no attempt to reconcile the massive discrepancy involved. In other words, it was a disaster waiting to happen, about which only the Scottish Office knew and about which only the Scottish Office could do something.

The claim has been made that the set-aside figures are higher in Scotland because a few farmers mistakenly included the area that they registered for set-aside and not the area for which they were claiming. Why did the Department not take that up at the time in 1989 and 1990? It is normally a very fastidious and efficient Department. The Minister has enormous expertise available at his disposal within the Department.

If there is a difference of 0·1 hectare in the total submitted on their forms, farmers find that their forms will be sent back to them pronto, yet these enormous global discrepancies are appearing. The census forms clearly paid a part in the present problem. Like many other statistics, agricultural census data are useful in portraying trends, but are less accurate in absolute terms. However, it appears that the Scottish Office was issuing two differing sets of data from different sections of its Agriculture and Fisheries Department.

The census unit figures show a mean average that closely corresponds with the integrated administration and control system, and therefore with the accurate data. The Scottish Office appears to have used actual payment figures to calculate the base area, at a far lower and therefore punitive overshoot level. To my mind, that seems to be the core of the present problem. The Minister, however, has stated that the Scottish Office figures are "absolutely accurate". Yet I have a note from the Scottish Office stating:

> "Set aside: Please note we are currently revising all June census data under this heading for every year it has been collected. We know many farmers have entered incorrect areas when completing their census form. Please disregard any set aside data previously supplied."

It is dated 10 November 1993—only last month—so those are hardly immutable and absolutely accurate figures on which the Minister bases his overshoot case. That view is also confirmed in correspondence that I have received from farmers.

If the Minister believes that those statistics are absolutely reliable can he explain why the total area of agricultural land in Scotland dropped from 5,967,551 hectares in 1986 to 5,364,003 hectares in 1987? That is equivalent to a drop of 11 per cent. According to the June census, the amount of land in agricultural use remains at that lower figure. Why does an area of land the size of Tayside disappear from statistics that are supposed to be immutable and absolutely accurate? I should be interested to know whether common grazing has been taken out of the total.

Perhaps the Minister can also explain why the area devoted to roads, yards and buildings, as recorded in the June census for the years 1982 to 1992, varies from the mean by minus 15 per cent. to plus 25 per cent. Why is such a gigantic variation of 40 per cent. acceptable to the Scottish Office? Roads, yards and buildings do not just materialise and dematerialise, but that is what has happened according to the reliable, immutable statistics on which the Minister has based his case. So far he has said that he will brook no further changes to them.

The doubts about the statistics and their effect on agriculture are grave enough to enable the Minister to argue in Europe about the base area in order to ensure a better deal for our agricultural sector.

The statistics have been used to impose a massive financial penalty on Scottish agriculture. Why did the Scottish Office declare to the European Commission an overshoot of 16 per cent., before it realised that some farms had been wrongly classified as belonging purely to the less-favoured area category? Those farms were split between LFAs and non-LFAs. Surely that problem should have been foreseen when the base figure was being calculated. A glance at the size of the LFA figure should have warned the Scottish Office, because it was far too high, but it used that figure to declare an overshoot of 16 per cent. It then had to rush to negotiate that down to 5·4 per cent. At least that action has established a precedent, because the Scottish Office changed those supposedly immutable, absolutely accurate statistics.

The Scottish Office changed the figures relating to the LFA and non-LFA split, but no allowance was made for the fact that the percentage area of crop in LFAs could vary from season to season. That is yet another possible variation in the supposedly immutable statistics.

The Minister set a precedent—I am glad that he did so —by using IACS forms in 1993 to adjust retrospectively the LFA and non-LFA split. Given that it is not possible to pinpoint the LFA and non-LFA crop on such split farms, can the Minister confirm that it was only possible to estimate the area of land included in the LFA base area? I am told that it is not possible to calculate that figure accurately. The answer derived must have been a guesstimate because it uses figures which, by their nature, cannot be accurately substantiated.

The Minister was prepared to argue the 16 per cent., overshoot down to 5·4 per cent. on the basis of the figures quoted, but he should go one further. He should follow the example of the Germans and argue to get the set-aside penalty reduced further.

For the purpose of the June census, the split farms were returned as LFAs, but we know that that return has always been false because the estimated number of LFAs is greater than the number that exist. It is on the basis of that miscalculation that Scottish agriculture now faces a swingeing set-aside penalty.

The Minister should consider Scotland in its international context within the European Union. So far only two countries have officially admitted to an overshoot in their base areas—Scotland has admitted a 5·4 per cent. overshoot in non-LFAs and Germany has admitted an overshoot of 9·7 per cent. Germany, however, has had that overshoot reduced to 1 per cent. and is now arguing for a further reduction. Scotland's overshoot was reduced from 16 per cent. to 5·4 per cent. as a result of the figures submitted, but the Scottish Office has now stopped arguing its own corner.

The English figures are due out soon, and it is thought that the original substantial undershoot will be reduced close to the English baseline limit. The Minister should also consider the example of Spain. It had reported an overshoot, but, because of a drought during the three base years on which calculations were based, the Spaniards are sorting that problem out, before their figures are submitted.

If I were at the Cortes and I were a Spanish Member of Parliament, I would find that the Minister would agree and would do something about the matter. If I were a German Member of Parliament, I would find that the Minister would go further and ask for more reductions to the much reduced levels that had been achieved. Fortunately, I am a Scottish Member of Parliament; unfortunately, however, I am arguing with a Minister who appears to be remaining static over the 5·4 per cent. figure.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Sir Hector Monro): The hon. Gentleman may be surprised.

Mr. Welsh: I hope that I shall be surprised and that the Minister will make an appropriate announcement. As I would be the first to criticise his mistakes, I would also be the first to congratulate him if he does make an announcement. It would be the result of calls from representatives of the sector and hon. Members of all parties to reverse a decision that should not have been made in the first place.

The Scottish farmers are asking the Minister to fight on the political front and to reconsider the Scottish figures and, like his European counterparts, to take that political battle to the Commission before penalties are imposed. Scottish cereal growers already have the highest rate of set-aside and the highest reduction of production in Europe. Unless that 5·4 per cent. figure is withdrawn, further excessive penalties will be imposed on the agricultural sector.

In a recent Adjournment debate, the Minister stated that the scheme was entirely voluntary and that farmers do not have to use it and can grow as much as they wish. My reading of his own example of a 600-acre farm is that farmers would be 56 per cent. worse off in 1994 and 77 per cent. worse off in 1995 if they stayed out of the scheme. Far from the Minister's claim that the income of a 600-acre farm would increase by 17 per cent. in 1994, I am informed that farmers would face reductions in profitability of between 28 and 56 per cent. next year and between 51 and 77 per cent. in 1995. Farmers' returns will remain reasonably static, as the scheme intends, only if there is no penal set-aside imposed on the sector.

The Minister said that English farmers are growing malting barley over and above feed barley, which is, he said:

"perhaps being grown ineffectively in Scotland."—[Official Report, 24 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 560.]

Such comments only make Scottish arable farmers feel that they do not have the support of the Minister in charge of agriculture. If the Minister thinks about that comment, which was perhaps made in the heat of the debate, he may wish to withdraw it or to clarify it further.

The farmers are facing an acute situation. Who is to blame? The Government say that it is not them and that they gave a clear warning over a year ago on overshoot penalties. The Minister said that the farmers are to blame and that Scottish farmers were:

"No doubt following what their college advisors or other experts told them."

He said that the farmers have tried to maximise their share of £80 million taxpayers' support available to them on a voluntarily scheme. The Minister is accusing Scottish farmers of greed and Scottish colleges and advisers of offering bad advice. I find that incredible. The Minister is also attacking his own Scottish Office officials who worked hard to advise farmers at meetings throughout Scotland about the new scheme.

The whole exercise has been Treasury driven. The Minister was keen to point out the total amount of cash that has been provided for the agriculture sector and that the £20 million loss should be put in that context. He should also acknowledge that politicians created the set-aside provision as a mechanism to reduce cereal production and to stabilise incomes through a period of transition. Politicians created the system in Europe to ease dislocation during that period of transition. If that system is the bedrock of change in other parts of Europe, why single out Scotland for extra financial punishment? Is the measure Treasury-driven rather than agriculture-driven? There must be more than a suspicion that it is. Compensation given by Europe is designed, as the Minister will know because of his background, to redress the balance against prices falling to world levels. Set-aside payments leading to lower production and oil seed payments replacing crushing subsidy paid to crushers are all measures introduced to help the industry through a period of transition.

I must refer the Minister to the heart of the matter, which is the base area calculation. I believe that the Council of Ministers met at 6.50 this morning, and that the base area of the new Länder in Germany is to be increased by 181,000 hectares to take account of a statistical error. I hope that the Minister will continue to ensure that Scotland is treated in a similar fashion. Let him join his German colleagues who succeeded in securing a reduction from 9 to 1 per cent. and who have now gone further, securing that extra concession from the Commission.

I believe that penalties that would otherwise apply in Scotland because of the overshoot in the base area will be reduced in line with the procedure already used for the new German Länder—namely, the progressive application of the levy. Will the Minister clarify that? If the penalties are reduced in line with the arrangements for the new Länder, it will be on a reducing scale. But there will be overshoot next year and, although it may be less, a penalty on overshoot remains.

Can the Minister clarify whether the new move through the EC Commission applies to the base area or purely to the payments? If it applies to the payments alone, it is a palliative and the problems will continue, because it is the base area calculation which lies at the heart of the difficulties facing the industry and which will cumulatively impose a penalty on it in coming years. Is the derogation for both payments and set-aside or for payments alone? If it is for payments alone, the root base area problem will not be solved.

If the base area difficulty remains, will the Minister look again at base area size to ensure that it truly reflects the reality of Scottish agriculture? Unless that is done, the problems will return to haunt us year after year, and the problems and anxieties of the past traumatic months will remain. Agriculture is too important to Scotland and the Scottish economy to be treated in this way. I ask the Minister to give our industry the sort of level playing field that his European counterparts have fought to secure for their industries. I hope that he will clarify the base area issue and tackle that problem, which lies at the heart of the difficulties that the industry faces.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I thank the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) for allowing me a couple of minutes. I doubt whether I have ever known a time when Scottish farmers were so upset. I am deeply concerned at the breakdown in communications between agriculture and the Department. That needs to be mended. It is important that the good relations enjoyed in the past continue.

My views on Europe are well known to the House. We are supposed to be at the heart of Europe. I want to be sure that farmers in Scotland cannot point the finger at the Government and say, "We are not at the heart of Europe because we are not being treated in the same way as everyone else."

12.12 pm

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I congratulate the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) on his contribution to the debate. Let me also remind the House that my hon. Friends the Members for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) and for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) have been closely involved in the debate generally and share the hon. Gentleman's concern about the overshoot in Scottish agricultural payments.

The points about the German treatment were well made. I understand that the penalty has been reduced to about 10 per cent. of what was originally suggested. Can the Minister say just how the Germans have managed to achieve that and whether the British Government can secure a similar deal for our producers?

My second point is that Opposition Members have always had grave doubts about the whole principle of the set-aside programme. Is it not disgraceful that Scottish farmers are being prevented from meeting a demand for barley? I thought that the whole point of the reform of agriculture was that we should match supply to demand, not that we should restrict Scottish producers from providing cereals for which there is a demand and so support jobs in the ancillary industries.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Sir Hector Monro): I am grateful to those hon. Members who have participated in this important debate. They made valid points.

Just a quickie to the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh): he quoted a sentence about "ineffectively producing barley". I must say that I winced at that when I read it the next morning. Something must have happened in Hansard. I certainly did not say that and, if I did, I did not mean it.

I welcome the debate because it gives me a further opportunity to answer various points that have been made in the press over the past few weeks. It is essential that farmers should not be misled and should know the true position about the overshoot that has occurred. I can announce good news from this week's Agriculture Council in Brussels, which finished earlier this morning.

The issue is detailed and complex. A good deal of misleading material has been circulating, hence my public rebuttal last week of the claims that my Department's figures were inaccurate. The statistical position has not changed, in essence, since we last discussed the matter in the House.

The overshoot is a real one. When we brought in the CAP reform package in 1992 it was a major United Kingdom victory—a point acknowledged by the National Farmers Union of Scotland at the time. We all have our views on set-aside. I have never been an enthusiast because I do not like to see agricultural land lying fallow or with a poor level of husbandry. I do not think that it is a good principle, but it is there and it is bringing a huge amount of money into agriculture.

The agreement was that the base arable area would be the average of the last three years before the CAP deal was struck. There was no discretion about which three years to use. Farmers had to use the three previous years, as laid down by the regulation. There was a discretion to divide Scotland into two base areas, specifically to allow our large high-yielding specialist arable farmers to benefit from the higher rate of payments available to them under the scheme. We did this with the agreement of the union, which was enthusiastic about it.

The Scottish base areas are correct; there is no discrepancy in the statistics. I specifically emphasise that it was correct, and a formal requirement under the EEC rules, to include in the base area the land that farmers actually set aside in the base years, and not the land that they might have thought about setting aside at one time or other. There is a considerable difference between the two.

The failure to realise this has contributed to much of the confusion within the industry. For example, some 6,000 farmers registered an interest in the five-year set-aside scheme whereas only 780 have entered the scheme. I once again give a categorical assurance that the figures used in my Department in relation to overshoot are accurate. Officials take great care and expend considerable efforts in their statistical work. It is a matter of regret that others have misunderstood or misinterpreted them. People did not choose to question the figures that were used to defeat the MacSharry proposals last year.

Mr. Welsh: Will the Minister give way?

Sir Hector Monro: No, I will press on because I have something important to say.

We do not believe that it would serve any useful purpose to repeat all that I said during the previous debate about the LFA—non-LFA split, but I must stress that it was with the NFU's agreement and encouragement that the Government secured that split so that the grain-growing areas of the non-LFA would receive more grant to reflect their higher yields than grain growers in the LFA region.

It is important to reiterate that the compensation under the scheme is substantially in excess of that required to overcome any fall in prices that may have occured. Compensation rates under the scheme are very generous, and it is not surprising if individual producers have claimed every possible hectare in their IACS forms, as it is their right to do. It is wrong for those producers, and others, to try to discredit the base area figures because of the collective result of the individual actions of some farmers. We must face up to what has occurred. Over a year ago, my Department gave a clear warning about the penalty for any overshoot over base area.

Participation in the scheme is entirely voluntary. Farmers are not obliged to join; they may sell as much arable crops outwith the scheme as they wish without setting aside land. If farmers do apply, there is no obligation on them to do so on all their arable land. They can be in the scheme and still grow grain over and above what they have applied for in terms of compensation. They are, however, collectively responsible for their individual actions. Those are, quite simply, the rules of the scheme.

Compensation rates will rise substantially in 1994. The increase will be combined with other increased payments to Scottish farmers so that the total direct agricultural support available in 1993-94 is estimated at some £300 million, an increase of almost 60 per cent. on this year's support of £188 million. Against that background, it is not credible to talk—as many have—about a spiral decline in the rural economy as a result of the overshoot.

Today, the Ministry is starting to issue payments to farmers under the scheme. A total of £64 million will be disbursed among 9,000 farmers. By the end of March next year, some £93 million will have been paid under the scheme. That is a huge sum in anyone's book. It should be remembered that the farmers did not have that £93 million last year; it is new money. The scheme is voluntary, and is there to help farmers withstand any fall in the grain price. I know that we have had a frightful harvest, but, by and large, the fall has not been substantial.

As the hon. Member for Angus, East explained the Spanish position very clearly, I shall not explain it again; nor shall I say any more about Brussels. Let me deal with a more important point. The hon. Gentleman did not give Ministers much credit for beavering away fiendishly over recent weeks to try to rectify the position resulting from the overshoot. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has been doing superb work in Brussels over the past few days, and has come up with a very satisfactory solution this morning. I give her great credit for what she has achieved. She will add to what I have said about set-aside—and, indeed, the whole issue —in a written answer later this afternoon.

Changes in the rules have been agreed specifically to alleviate the penalties that have applied in Scotland. Both the cut in hectare payments this year and the uncompensated set-aside penalty next year will be very much reduced. The arrangements are expected to be comparable to those relating to the German Länder. Those arrangements ensure that only 10 per cent. of the penalties due for the 1993 overshoot will be applied. If there is another overshoot in 1994, only 20 per cent. of the new penalty will be applied, and only 50 per cent. will apply in the event of an overshoot in a future year. The full penalty will apply only from 1996 onwards.

"Ten per cent." means 10 per cent. of 5·4: the penalty will be 0·5 per cent. The uncompensated set-aside in 1994 will be reduced from 23,000 hectares to around 2,300—a relatively small percentage in terms of overshoot. I stress that if we had the same overshoot in 1994—and we really must try to ensure that that does not happen—the figure would be 20 per cent. of 5·4: that is, 1 per cent. That represents a substantial improvement in the position of farmers in Scotland. If the 1994 overshoot were 23,000 hectares, the uncompensated set-aside in 1995 would be reduced to 4,600. All in all, that is a spectacular improvement in the position that farmers have got themselves into this year.

Mr. Welsh: Does that derogation apply to both set-aside and payments, or only to payments? I am sure that all farmers will welcome this respite, but if it does not apply to the base area the problem will recur.

Sir Hector Monro: I hope that I have already explained that the payment this year will be 0·5 per cent.—10 per cent. of 5·4—while the uncompensated set-aside will be reduced from 23,000 hectares to 2,300. That is a very small amount, when it is spread over the whole of the non-LFA area. It is an important victory for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and it has been warmly supported by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, both of whom have been beavering away in Europe to achieve a satisfactory solution. However, as Scottish farmers, we must understand that we must not overshoot again because, as has been proved, the problem builds up and will prove detrimental to the overall payments.

I in no way underestimate the large sums coming into Scottish agriculture this year as a result of the scheme. It was wrong of the industry, the millers and others to say that £20 million would be lost to the rural economy when I am putting £93 million into it. I do not understand how the hon. Member for Angus, East came up with the astonishing equation that the rural economy will be £20 million worse off when £93 million of absolutely new money is entering the Scottish agricultural scene.

The new scheme is extremely satisfactory for Scottish farmers and it is something which they should greet with open hands—I am sure that they will welcome the cheques that are already being sent out this week. I hope that farmers will realise that the change means that we shall have to continue to make the payments that were in the pipeline earlier in the week but that the additional money will be sent to them as soon as we can carry out the necessary administrative work.

Bearing in mind that the compensation rates will rise in 1994 and that there have been other increases in payments to Scottish farmers, the total direct agricultural support available in 1993-94 is estimated to be some £300 million, an increase of 60 per cent. on this year's support of £188 million. That makes it one of the best deals that the Scottish farming has had for many a day. That is true not only for the grain and arable sector but for the livestock sector, where payments have substantially increased and will overtake the income lost because of the reduction in the hill compensatory allowance. The extension of the suckler cow payment will mean that the same will happen for cattle.

We hope that with the continuing high level of the annual sheep premium, the farming community will realise that it is being well looked after by the Government, particularly in the less-favoured areas and hill areas. Of course, in the highlands and islands a special additional payment is also being made this year, so I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) is here.

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend's comments will have done much to restore confidence and faith and to allay the concerns that brought me here this morning. I congratulate him and his colleagues on what they have achieved.

Sir Hector Monro: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. We have made a significant announcement today, which shows that we have been doing all that we possibly could to alleviate the serious problem of overshoot. The position has now been clarified and the payments will go ahead, but I must issue a warning.

The Government want to help farming and ensure that the farming community receives the greatest possible income because of all the hazards of rural life. In exchange, however, we must ask farmers to try not to overshoot in the coming year. They will perhaps find ways of setting aside other areas of land, thereby not reducing the area of land under crop, especially grain. No one grows better malting barley than we do in Scotland and I do not want the quantity to be reduced. We want to help our distilleries further—they have already been helped by the general agreement on tariffs and trade and the Chancellor. We want to give the Scotch whisky industry the very best quality malt so that it can provide the best drink available anywhere in the world.

All in all, we are going away from our Christmas recess feeling that a major problem has been resolved, and that farmers can enjoy their cheques and use them—as I know they will have to—to maintain the quality of their output and the environmental advantages of living in Scotland. I hope that they feel that the Government have worked very hard to resolve the problem and that that is now satisfactorily resolved.

Royal Assent

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Act:

CONSOLIDATED FUND (NO. 3) ACT 1993.

Community Care

12.30 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Policies for the care of the mentally ill were far too restricted in the 1940s and the 1950s. Many people who should have been allowed to stay in the community were incarcerated in asylums. I believe that the pendulum has swung too far in the other direction. The entire basis of our policy is predicated on the assumption that the mentally ill are sufficiently mentally well to take rational decisions about their treatment. That paradox is compounded by the all-too-frequent reluctance of psychiatrists to section patients.

I shall refer to two letters that were sent to me by constituents. In one, a constituent said that her son had been released from prison where he spent four months as a result of violent behaviour. He was then sectioned by a judge to stay in Friern hospital for up to six months. Two days after he had arrived at Friern hospital, he telephoned his mother and said that he had been told words to the effect that he was well enough to leave. It was only as a result of the mother ringing up the hospital and imploring its staff to keep her son there that a meeting was arranged which she attended and it was agreed that he could stay in hospital somewhat longer.

That is an example of a judge sectioning someone to stay in hospital for up to six months and the hospital saying after two days, "You are well enough to leave". On closer examination, it was obvious that the boy was not well enough to leave and that he should stay in hospital.

A neighbour who lives just up the road from me in Hendon has had great problems with his sister. He wrote earlier this year that his sister had been arrested at the end of last year after a number of incidents. As a result, she was sectioned and taken into Napsbury hospital and detained for two weeks. She behaved herself in there, but refused any treatment and was released. The family was most concerned that that could happen and a meeting was arranged with her social worker. The other members of the family were invited to attend the meeting, which took place at Edgware general hospital. When they arrived, however, they were told that the sister and her husband had refused to attend. The meeting served only to convince my constituent that the social workers are just "not of this planet" and that the whole system needs reforming, for the main reason that, as he says,

> "a human being is living a life of anguish and torment when there is a possibility that with treatment her condition could be improved."

As my constituent continues—and no one could disagree —he finds it

> "incomprehensible that a person who is known to be mentally unbalanced is asked to decide if she wishes to receive treatment or not."

He ends the letter:

> "We can only cling to the hope that the present law will be reformed sooner rather than later."

I shall give another example of the reluctance of psychiatrists to section patients who need treatment in mental homes but who may not be willing to take it. A constituent of mine is convinced that the most gentle right hon. colleague of ours, my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson), is trying to poison her. One weekend there were 19 messages on my answerphone saying, "Sir Roddy"—as she calls him—"is trying to get me." I can think of no Member of this House who is less likely to poison a constituent than my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North.

I can think of no reason why my right hon. Friend should decide to move to a west Hendon council estate to poison one of my constituents. However, that poor lady suffers from that particular delusion and nothing is being done to help her. I have written letters to doctors and others, but they have not been dealt with satisfactorily.

That example underlines my point that all too often when a psychiatrist has to decide whether to err on the side of individual freedom or sectioning a patient, he will nearly always say, "Let him stay in the community as that is his freedom and right." At the end of the day, that benefits no one.

I want to underline that point by referring to a case in respect of which I attended the funeral of a 24-year-old constituent last summer. There is nothing unusual in Members of Parliament attending the funerals of their constituents. However, this occasion was particularly poignant because it was the funeral of a 24-year-old schizophrenic who had been receiving care in the community and who had committed suicide.

That young man had once been a lively, artistic and friendly lad who had never played a mean trick on anyone. However, he is alive no more. The occasion was particularly poignant because that boy's mother had warned the psychiatrists for many years that they were not giving that boy the right kind of treatment.

I have a file that deals with that case. The first letter on the file dates back to 29 November 1989 when a meeting took place between the psychiatrists and the boy's mother. The psychiatrists wrote back saying:

> "Following our last meeting with you and David and Diana, I thought that it would be helpful to clarify the agreements that we reached on that occasion. We are aware that you all feel that Mark is suffering from a mental illness sufficient to warrant his detention in hospital under the Mental Health Act since he is unwilling to come into hospital voluntarily and that so far on the occasions when he has been assessed by our crisis team, their assessments have not concurred with yours."

The mother battled on for another four years to try to secure the treatment that she felt was suitable and satisfactory for her son. The psychiatrists always said, "No, you don't understand. We are the experts. You are just the mother." However, at the end of the day, the mother understood her son better than they did. That poor boy finally committed suicide by jumping off a seven-storey building. It seems to me that we should listen more to the relatives on those occasions than we sometimes do.

When Ben Silcock was mauled by a lion, the problems of schizophrenics momentarily became headline news. However, I believe that there is little doubt that mental health has become the Cinderella of the health service. What is even worse is that the whole policy has become far too optimistic.

Care in the community sounds wonderful, but it ignores the wishes of relatives and basic reality. The reality is that many patients and schizophrenics refuse to take their medication when they are released from prison or hospital. Public opinion may concentrate on the 32 murders committed by schizophrenics who were enjoying care in the community. However, those deaths—all of which are regrettable and, more importantly, all of which were avoidable—are but the tip of a much larger iceberg.

Since I was first elected to the House, I have had several meetings with my local branch of the Schizophrenia Fellowship. The stories it tells are uniformly horrific. I will always remember a mother telling me that her daughter was sleeping on a park bench somewhere in London. She did not know which park and still less which bench. It is one of the ironies of care in the community that many of those who sleep rough in London are discharged mental patients.

Do we really enhance the quality of their lives by saying, "No, we will not give you care in an institution, but you can sleep rough on the embankment"?

One hears stories of a vicious circle—patients failing to take their medication and often becoming violent. All too often, those who are released into care in the community end up receiving institutional care in prison. They suffer unnecessarily; so, too, do their relatives, who feel powerless to influence psychiatrists and policy makers, and so, too do many innocent third parties.

On one occasion, I received a delegation from residents of a block of council flats in my constituency. I said, "What is your problem?" I wondered what Barnet council had done to annoy them. They said, "It's Mr. Campbell." I said, "What's Mr. Campbell done to annoy you?" They said, "Well, he was released from Napsbury." I said, "Yes, what else?" They said, "He has a hobby. It is to play his hi-fi system for 12 hours a day, starting at 8 pm and finishing at 8 am," rather like the sittings of the House this week, but it was quite unsocial for those who had to do a day's work after having their night disturbed by that gentleman.

The suicide case to which I referred is not isolated. Some of the others who attended that funeral told me that, in north-west London, five or six people who had received care in the community had committed suicide. The Boyd report said that, in one year, 107 discharged psychiatric patients had committed suicide. Each week, about three people die either by suicide or are murdered by schizophrenics because care in the community has failed them and failed the community.

It is not only in Britain that difficulty has been experienced in persuading schizophrenics to take their medication. In Canada, for example, social security benefits are now paid only to those who are still taking their medication. Although that policy was originally opposed on civil liberty grounds, it is seen to be effective and it could be tried here.

There needs to be a closer working relationship between psychiatrists and relatives. The mother of my deceased constituent said of the psychiatrist, "If only he had listened to me." Many of those whom I meet are critical of psychiatrists' attitudes to them, the parents, and those who know the victims of schizophrenia.

In London, patients have frequently been released, despite an adequate number of psychiatric beds elsewhere in London which could take them. Despite the reluctance of individuals to take drugs when they are released into the community, they are still released into the community. One cannot blame individuals for refusing to take medication —it is not particularly pleasant. When we were children, we were told that the nastiest medicine was the most effective, but that did not make us more willing to take it, whatever else our mothers might have said and however well they might have tried to sweeten the pill.

If a patient is told, "You can go into the community, but carry on taking the medicine," he must be tempted to say to himself, "They have said that I can go into the community, so I must now be all right; I do not need to take the medication." We then have the vicious circle of individuals refusing to take medication, becoming violent and then indulging in antisocial behaviour, ending with their being institutionalised, not in hospitals but in prisons.

We must remember the impact of the release of individuals not only on themselves but on others. We must consider the impact on relatives. They are frequently devastated when they see the poor quality of life that their loved ones have outside hospital. We must remember victims who are murdered, assaulted, attacked or raped when individuals are cared for in the community.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is widely recognised as a humane Minister and someone who is socially concerned. I should like to ask her and my hon. Friend the Minister who will reply to the debate to look again at the policy that has caused heartache to so many and to look again at the availability of psychiatric beds in London before deciding to close our other hospitals or to encourage psychiatrists to release people into the community.

We must also remember the potential victims and try to stop them becoming victims when people who should not be are released. Only a few thousand people need to be treated in institutions rather than in the community. It is not a major problem in terms of numbers, but it can be a major problem if one is the patient, the patient's relative or a potential victim of someone who is not taking his medication.

Individuals who suffer from mental illness are just as deserving of care in hospital as victims of other illnesses. In days gone by, there was no disgrace in being sent to a fever hospital because one suffered from fevers. Today, there should be no disgrace in being in an asylum if one suffers from an illness which needs to be treated there. It is much better that such individuals are treated in the appropriate place rather than sent into the community, where the care may well be inappropriate to their illness and may cause them to do things that they later regret, and which their relatives and their victims regret.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on securing time today to debate the important topic of community care and the mentally ill. I think that my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) will read the proceedings with some interest, if not some astonishment.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South has close links with several voluntary organisations working in mental illness. He takes a keen interest in matters that affect mentally ill people. I pay tribute to his hard work on behalf of that vulnerable group in our society. I know that he is a keen supporter of the National Schizophrenia Fellowship. The NSF does much valuable work to promote the interests of people with schizophrenia. That is why we are supporting it to the tune of more than £170,000 this year.

My hon. Friend expressed several concerns about the provision of services. I am pleased to be able to respond and say how we are taking forward care in the community for the mentally ill. I begin by reminding the House of the size of the agenda before us. About one person in 10 suffers from some form of mental illness in the course of a year. Mental illness is as common as heart disease and three times more common as cancer. For example, about seven people per 1,000 of the population will suffer from schizophrenia at some point in their life. Currently, it affects an estimated quarter of a million people.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE

Our policy is to encourage the development of locally based health and social services to meet the needs of people of all ages who suffer from mental illness. The aim is to provide a range of services that are local, comprehensive and sensible. The principal components of such a service must be effective assessment of need, community mental health teams supporting mentally ill people in their home, effective links with primary care services, an adequate range of day care services, adequate short and long-term hospital provision and an adequate range of health authority and local authority respite services.

This policy can be delivered successfully only by health authorities and local authorities working together and in co-operation with the relevant voluntary organisations and the private sector to provide a multi-agency and multi-disciplinary range of services, treatment and care. There is no doubt that our policy of providing care in the community enjoys widespread support, which is borne out by public attitude surveys. However, I recognise and understand the concern about the level and range of services being provided. That is why we set up the mental health task force. Its remit is to help unlock resources from the old, long-stay institutions and to help build up a balanced range of local services, based on best practice. That should meet my hon. Friend's request about places being available before hospitals are closed.

My hon. Friend also referred to rough sleepers and mental illness. He is right that very often many people who sleep rough suffer from some degree of mental illness. However, surveys of such people show that they have never been in touch with the psychiatric services. They have not been under their care and then returned to the community. He also mentioned some suggestions on conditions for benefits based on the experience in Canada. I, too, have visited Canada and the United States to look at some of their schemes. The one that he highlighted would be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, should it be decided that conditions be attached to benefit. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend will see and hear what my hon. Friend has said.

We are taking several initiatives to help provide a better range of services and those include the mental illness specific grant and the care programme approach.

The grant is paid to local authorities to help bring about a significant improvement in the social care provided to people with mental illness. It has been widely welcomed by local authorities and has proved a great success, stimulating more than 800 projects and bringing help to about 64,000 people. Since we started the grant two years ago, we have increased it by 47 per cent. in real terms and this year it stands at £34·4 million, supporting total spending of £48·4 million.

We introduced the care programme approach in April 1991 and it is intended to cover all patients being considered for discharge from mental illness hospitals and all new patients accepted by the specialist psychiatric services. The needs of each patient for continuing health and social care and for accommodation should be systematically assessed and effective systems should be put in place to ensure that agreed health and, where necessary, social care services are provided to those patients who can be treated in the community. Explicit, individually tailored care programmes are drawn up and a key worker is identified to keep in close touch with the patient and to ensure that the agreed package of health and social care is being delivered.

We now intend to strengthen that system. In particular, we want to deal urgently with the problem presented by a very small number of patients who, as my hon. Friend said, slip through the net of community care. On 12 August, we announced a 10-point plan to reinforce the provision of community care for mentally ill people. That plan very much takes into account the sort of difficulties and the occasional tragic cases that my hon. Friend mentioned.

That comprehensive package of measures, reinforced by stronger legal powers, includes a new power of supervised discharge. That was discussed in depth in the report that we published of the Department of Health review of the legal powers and of the care of mentally ill people, on which we are consulting.

The idea is to provide a legislative framework to enable carers to give greater support to that small minority of especially vulnerable patients. Those are the people whose condition can deteriorate, especially if they fail to take their medication as my hon. Friend said, so that they present a risk either to themselves or to others. We want patients to be clear about what their treatment in the community involves and their care programmes will be carefully agreed with them before they are discharged. A failure to comply with the conditions would lead to an immediate review of the case and recall to hospital, if appropriate.

The other measures announced in our 10-point plan are intended to ensure that that happens. They include clarification of existing powers under the Mental Health Act 1983, attention to the special demands on the mental health services in London to which my hon. Friend referred, and a review of the clinical standards of care for people with schizophrenia. We shortly aim to issue new guidance on the discharge of psychiatric patients, and we are moving ahead with arrangements for a national conference to establish an agreed approach to the training of key workers.

The new version of the code of practice that has been approved by Parliament emphasises the criteria for admission to hospital under the Act. In addition, we are discussing with the Royal College of Psychiatrists a possible training pack for section 12 doctors who are approved under the 1983 Act as having special experience in the diagnosis or treatment of mental disorder. As part of that, we shall consider whether the material might be used for training social workers in their responsibilities under the Act.

I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the code of practice, which makes it clear that people can be taken to hospital for assessment should their health be at risk or if they are a potential safety risk to themselves or to anybody else. Perhaps that has not always been understood in the past, but it is made clear in the new code of practice and I hope that that will be helpful.

The best safeguards for patients and the public are still professional judgment, co-operation between services and a proper understanding of the powers that are available under the Act and the limits that it imposes. It is just over a year since the Government's public health strategy, "The Health of the Nation" was published. As the House knows, the White Paper set targets for improvements in health and reductions in morbidity. It is significant that mental illness, which has often received insufficient attention in the past, was chosen as one of the five key areas. Reducing suicide is the other side of the coin of improving the health and treatment of people with mental illness.

My hon. Friend spoke about a tragic case and I am determined to do everything possible to reduce the rate of suicide. As he knows, the targets in "The Health of the Nation" are for the overall rate of suicide and the specific rate in the case of people who have some form of mental illness.

We also seek to improve primary care for the mentally ill. General practitioners come into contact with, and are responsible for treating, the bulk of those with psychiatric disorders. My Department is funding the work of the senior mental health fellow in general practice so as to cascade knowledge and skills to GP tutors and course organisers, and it supports the "Defeat depression" campaign being run by the Royal College of Psychiatrists and the Royal College of General Practitioners.

Adequate resources are important and the Government are firmly committed to improving services for the mentally ill. That is demonstrated by the fact that, including secure provision, about £2 billion is being spent this year on mental illness. That figure, although impressive, does not tell the whole story, because it does not show the 37 per cent. increase in real-terms in gross expenditure on hospital and community health services since 1979, and a real terms increase of 86 per cent. in gross expenditure on local authority social services.

Those figures clearly demonstrate that the Government are committed to their policies for the mentally ill. However, the Government can provide only the framework and guidelines for policy. It is up to local health and social services departments to use and develop those as they assess and seek to meet local needs in mental health. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for initiating the debate and for the measured way in which he put his case.

I am grateful to the many people working in the professions and voluntary organisations, who do so much for mentally ill people. I am grateful also for the opportunity to respond to my hon. Friend. I share his determination that mentally ill people should receive the right blend of high-quality treatment and care.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order.

Cyprus

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): Cyprus is often debated by the House and we would all say rightly so. It is a member of the Commonwealth, and the United Kingdom is one of the island's guarantor powers. Nineteen years after the brutal invasion by the Turkish army that divided the island, thousands of Turkish troops are still there and thousands more settlers have been brought from mainland Turkey. Both actions were and remain a scandalous infringement of the rights of the democratic republic of Cyprus and its people.

I welcome the presence in the Chamber of my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) and the hon. Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend), who have loyally been committed to finding an honourable and just solution to the tragedy that has befallen Cyprus since the Turkish invasion. We have always made it clear that we seek a settlement that ensures the rights of both the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities.

There have been many hopes of such a settlement over the years, but time and again Mr. Denktash and Ankara have rejected any attempt to reach one. One has only to read the reports of the United Nations Secretary-General to know who is clearly to blame for that lack of progress.

After 19 years, can progress be reported? After all the discussions, is it possible to say, "Progress has been slow in some respects, but here is an example of the commitment of Mr. Denktash and Ankara"? The purpose of this debate is to learn Government thinking, the actions that they think should or need to be taken to restart talks, and what they think should be on the agenda. Are the Government in discussions with the United Nations Secretary-General? If so, what is the subject of that discussion?

The United Kingdom is not only a guarantor power but a member of the United Nations Security Council. What contacts have the Government made with the two other guarantor powers—Greece and Turkey? I hope that the Minister will give a clear and direct answer. Would the Government support any action taken on Cyprus by the Greek Government when it assumes the EC presidency in the near future? What would be the Government's attitude if the Greek Government wanted, as a guarantor power, to put Cyprus high on the agenda?

When Commonwealth Heads of Government met in Cyprus last October, they issued a statement on the Cyprus situation that was fully supported by the British Government and every country represented at that conference.

Perhaps the Minister will tell us what has happened since then. Will I hear today? Will the House be informed of the actions that the Government have taken following the passing of unanimous resolutions at the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference in Cyprus in October? We hear repeatedly of the need for confidence-building measures and we would all agree with that.

I could name a couple of actions that could be taken in a matter of days and which, without doubt, would lead to confidence-building measures starting to take place: first, a sizeable reduction in the number of Turkish issue troops who are now in northern Cyprus; and, secondly, a complete stop—I emphasise "complete stop"—in the number of settlers who now come from Turkey into northern Cyprus. Those are confidence-building measures which could be taken without any great delay or problem if the Turkish Government wished to.

I must tell the Minister that the real confidence-building measure would be regarded as the decision that is taken on the town of Famagusta. It is empty of people, except for troops. Just what do the Government say on the issue of Famagusta? Do they support the return of Famagusta? I stress "Famagusta". I do not say "parts of Famagusta", but the full return of the town. The Minister may be aware that that is fully supported by the United Nations.

I am often told, as are other hon. Members who have come to hear my remarks and who hope to make a short contribution, that the United Kingdom Government fully support the efforts of the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General is now calling for the full return of Famagusta. As one of the guarantor powers, do we support that? I must stress to the Minister that it is not some kind of trade-off. It is an issue on which the actions of Mr. Denktash and Ankara will be judged as to their real commitment to a settlement and to the full return of the town of Famagusta.

I have a copy of the document of the Security Council of the United Nations dated 15 December, which was adopted unanimously. Perhaps the Minister has seen it. It says that the Security Council

> "Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by the end of February 1994 on the outcome of his efforts to achieve an agreement on a package of confidence-building measures."

The next two months will test the sincerity of Mr. Denktash and Ankara. I stress to the Minister that that sincerity will not be expressed through their ideas or proposals, but by their full support for the actions of the Secretary-General on Famagusta. The Cyprus Government have fully supported the proposals of the Secretary-General since May this year. There is no question of needing to go to the Cyprus Government to see what they believe. They have clearly announced their stand on this very important issue. The real test of commitment will soon be on Mr. Denktas and Ankara. I hope that we shall hear today where the British Government stand on that commitment.

During Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs questions this week, my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) asked what the Government's response would be to the request from the European Union to have a monitor attending the forthcoming discussions between Cyprus and the officials from northern Cyprus. That person would sit in on those discussions and report back to the Community. The Minister replied that a decision would be made on 20 December. I need hardly remind the House that Monday is 20 December. I expect the Government have already made their decision and I hope that it is favourable to my hon. Friend's request.

Last week, elections took place in occupied northern Cyprus. Although no other country in the world, with the exception of Turkey, recognises northern Cyprus, to be frank, we all know that the Government have contacts in that area. That is what one would expect. What is the Government's views of those elections? To whom are they talking in northern Cyprus?

Those who care about Cyprus look to the future when we genuinely hope that the island of Cyprus becomes a united Cyprus in which the rights of both communities are properly safeguarded. The British Government should ensure that basic freedoms are secured for the people of Cyprus—that is of paramount importance. Refugees should be free to return to wherever their homes were before the 1974 invasion. People should have the freedom to own property and the freedom to move anywhere within the island of Cyprus. Those basic freedoms should be guaranteed for all Cypriots and should be contained within any agreement. I hope that the Minister will make it clear that such commitments and confidence-building measures, about which we hear repeatedly, are supported by the Government. I hope, in time, that they will also be supported by Mr. Denktash and others in Ankara because, as I have already said, in February the Secretary-General will report back to the Security Council on what has happened in the intervening two months since this week's resolution was passed.

I am grateful to the Minister for his presence today, because this debate is of crucial importance to our country. We cannot say that we are concerned about the problem but argue that it does not affect us. I hope that the Minister will offer a real commitment on the part of the British Government. I also hope that he will confirm that between now and when the Secretary-General reports to the Security Council, the Government will make it clear to Mr. Denktash and his colleagues in Ankara that the time has come for their meaningful involvement in the discussions conducted by the Secretary-General.

In recent years, we have had many discussions that have got nowhere. The latest discussion in the long-running tragedy is a test of the sincerity of Mr. Denktash and those in Ankara.

1.13 pm

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I am immensely grateful to the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who is a fellow friend of Cyprus, for allowing me to contribute to this debate. I congratulate him on securing more Adjournment debates on Cyprus than I have managed to do over the years. I thought that I had the record. I also congratulate him on putting the obvious points with great vigour and effectiveness.

I have been involved in the fortunes and misfortunes of the beautiful but tragic island of Cyprus since I first went there as a young, inexperienced soldier in 1958, when I had the privilege to guard the last colonial governor of Cyprus. From that time, Britain has had more responsibility towards Cyprus than any of the other 180 countries in the United Nations. In recent years, there has been a temptation for the Foreign Office to say that we are fitting in behind the United Nations and the Commonwealth and that we are playing our part. I passionately believe that we should not just be playing a part, but taking a leading role because of our unique responsibilities. Indeed, the United States looks to London to give a lead.

What is happening in Cyprus is intolerable. It is a European and fellow Commonwealth country which is tragically divided. It is too small in political, economic and commercial terms to be divided in that cruel way.

I hope that the Minister will comment on the use of northern Cyprus to harbour refugees from justice, which is an unattractive feature and a growing tendency. As the Ministers knows from my correspondence with him and his officials, it is time for the Government to take some action and we are anxious to hear the Minister's response. Above all, I hope that he will tell us that Britain understands its clear duty in the matter.

1.17 pm

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) for allowing other hon. Members a few minutes in which to speak and I congratulate him on securing the debate.

After almost 20 years, it is time that the Government, as a guarantor, decided to do something positive. For almost 20 years, the northern part of Cyprus has been illegally occupied by Turkish troops and it is time that the Government set about settling the problem. Most people refer to the occupation as the Cyprus problem. I refer to it as the Turkish problem, because Turkey made the initial decision and it has the problem. How could we allow such a situation to occur and how can we allow it to continue in this day and age? I welcome the recent moves that the Government have made over Northern Ireland, as do most hon. Members, but it is time that the Government started to make moves to sort out the problem in Cyprus.

On a recent visit to Cyprus, what moved me most was meeting the people who are refugees in their own country. It is unimaginable to us that those refugees look over the border and the barbed wire and see living in their houses and stealing their property, people who were brought in by Turkey and were not born and bred in Cyprus. It cannot be nice to look over that barbed wire week in and week out for almost 20 years at other people who are occupying one's land. It is time that the Government began dealing properly with the problem.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on having secured the debate on this important issue. I know how strongly he feels about the matter from meetings that we have had at the Foreign Office and from correspondence on behalf of the people whom he represents. He has brought his judgment to bear on that issue for many years, as have the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend).

We are bound to Cyprus by many ties of family, of history, and of political interests. It is an island which is tragically divided and I also believe that the division is unacceptable. We must not accept that just because the division has existed for 20 years we must somehow learn to live with it. We must redouble our efforts to reach a settlement and a solution. This is not a party political issue: the original division took place under a Labour Government and it has persisted under Conservative Governments. It is generally recognised on both sides of the House that the present situation is unacceptable.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I warmly welcome the Minister's comments—especially those about the unacceptability of the division of Cyprus. Have the British Government officially made it clear to Turkey and the illegal regime in northern Cyprus that, no matter how long it continues, the present division can never be tolerated or accepted in a civilised society?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I can add to that. We have made it clear that we do not recognise the so-called Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus and that we have no intention of doing so. We were disappointed—and said so—when Mr. Denktash was not able to follow President Clerides in accepting a package of confidence-building measures, which, as we heard, was proposed by the United Nations Secretary-General. We were particularly disappointed when Mr. Denktash did not return to New York—effectively stalling the talks since that time in the summer. We attach considerable weight to the success of those measures. The hon. Member for Tooting mentioned Famagusta. Among the confidence-building measures is the return of Varosha, which is part of Famagusta, to the control of the United Nations. That, in turn, should lead to a more general settlement.

Such measures are crucial because confidence is essential if any long-term settlement is to be achieved. A new generation is growing up on both sides of the divide. Those young people have no experience of living together in a united island. At one time, Turks, Turkish Cypriots and Greek Cypriots lived together and, despite undoubted differences, by and large rubbed along and learnt to live with one another. Memories of that time are fading; it is outside young people's experience. For that reason, too, it is important that the political leaders on the island find it in themselves to reach a long-term political settlement.

Since the talks were stalled, there have been elections in northern Cyprus. We do not know what the final outcome will be in terms of the Government, but those elections give a new opportunity. There is the hope—shared, I know, by the United Nations—that we can return to the question of the confidence-building measures. Mr. Clark, the special representative of the Secretary-General, has been asked to resume intensive contact with both sides—and, indeed, with Turkey—following the elections. On 15 December—the date mentioned by the hon. Member for Tooting—the Security Council also endorsed that approach.

The question of an EC observer has been raised. I have been asked what will happen on Monday at the Foreign Affairs Council. That will depend on what European Union member states conclude at the time. I cannot prejudge that discussion. It is, after all, a joint decision that we hope to reach about the possible appointment of an EC observer. I can tell the House that we are being genuinely open-minded about the matter and approach it without prejudice. Our judgment must be influenced chiefly by what is best for the prospect of confidence-building measures. Will the appointment of an observer aid that process? In answer to a question on Wednesday, I said that, if we are satisfied that that will help and not impede the success of those confidence-building measures, we will give the matter favourable consideration.

The Secretary-General laid considerable emphasis on other means by which the European Union might visibly support his efforts. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary did just that when he, along with other European Ministers, met Mr. Cetin, the Turkish Foreign Minister, on 8 November at the European Union/Turkey Association Council. My right hon. Friend made it clear to the Turkish Minister that we wished to make rapid progress with the confidence-building measures, after the election in northern Cyprus, and that we looked to the Turkish Government to use their influence and best endeavours to accelerate that process.

[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory]

We all want a just, viable and lasting settlement, which must be reached by the two communities together. No great imperial power can impose a settlement. The days of colonialism are past—[Interruption.] No doubt to the regret of my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames). We must take the longer, perhaps stonier, road of getting the local communities and politicians to negotiate between themselves, within a framework set by others, together with all possible assistance and support from friends of Cyprus and from both sides of the community.

We are aiming at a bi-communal, bi-zonal federation. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary put it clearly in the House on 19 November when he said that he was aiming for

> "one country, one Cyprus, one Government and two communities."—[Official Report, 19 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 117.]

There is no question of our recognising the so-called "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus." We condemned its purported declaration in 1983 and the Government helped to secure the United Nations Security Council resolution 541, which considered that declaration to be legally invalid, and that remains our position.

People get confused about why we have contact with the Turkish Cypriot community at all. We are one of the guarantor powers of the treaty of guarantee, and we have a clear obligation to deal with both communities. For that reason, we maintain contact with Mr. Denktash and others who are prominent and have influence in the northern Cyprus community—but that does not imply recognition.

Future efforts will be directed chiefly towards the success of the confidence-building measures, and the recent elections have given us a new opportunity in that respect. Following those elections, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has sent messages to his Greek and Turkish counterparts, and to Mr. Clerides and Mr. Denktash, urging them to do their utmost to reach a settlement.

We will follow that up. We have reopened the issue not only by way of direct correspondence with those concerned, but my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will discuss Cyprus with Mrs. Ciller, the Prime Minister of Turkey, when he meets her in the margins of the NATO summit on 10 January. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will raise the issue of Cyprus when he meets Mr. Cetin, the Turkish Foreign Minister, in Akara during his visit to Turkey on 19 and 20 January. After that visit, my right hon. Friend plans to visit Greece and to follow up those discussions in direct communications with the Greek Government on 21 January.

We should see the package of confidence-building measures as important, but they are only the first step. After that, we must make progress with the Secretary-General's set of ideas—which, naturally, we shall support. We cannot compel a solution to be found, but we must work with a will.

Compromises will be required on both sides. We require genuine power sharing between the two communities. The possible nature of the ultimate political arrangement cannot be foreseen at this point, but I can reaffirm that we will not rest until a final solution has been achieved.

Live Animals (Transport)

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): This is a matter of great concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House. I have been involved with horses all my life, as a rider and as one concerned about their welfare; I am in my 21st year of service on the council of the British Horse Society, to which I have been consistently re-elected. The society is the national controlling body: it controls everything to do with horses except racing. Some years ago, I received the award of merit from the society for outstanding services to the horse world.

This is probably the last chance for us to wish my hon. Friend the Minister all happiness: next week, he is marrying a wonderful lady, and marrying into a wonderful family whom I have known for some years.

The transport of live animals deserves considerable attention from both the United Kingdom Government and the European Community—and, indeed, from the whole world. The British people are enormously concerned about the welfare of animals, which is reflected in the size of the post bags received by Members of Parliament. A recent survey revealed that, apart from housing, animal welfare constituted the largest single element of hon. Members' post bags.

Although animal welfare as a whole covers a huge range of subjects, the House should be in no doubt about the extent of public concern about the transport of live animals. In a recent parliamentary answer, my hon. Friend the Minister acknowledged that his Department had received more than 100,000 items of correspondence on the issue, as well as numerous petitions. A further answer revealed that, since 1 November, the Ministry had received more than 17,000 letters. In recent weeks, more than 800 letters a day have been pouring in. I congratulate the Minister on coping with all that, and the British people on their vigilance in writing.

Why should the British public express themselves in such numbers? They may have been made aware by the campaigns of the RSPCA, the British Horse Society and others—including the International League for the Protection of Horses—of the plight of animals subjected to lengthy and unnecessary journeys en route to slaughter; but awareness alone does not generate such large post bags. The answer lies in public revulsion at the suffering of the animals—more than 2 million of them—that leave our shores each year, and impatience with the continuing trade and the horrors that accompany it.

In recent years, undercover RSPCA inspectors have documented numerous examples of animals suffering in transit. It is true that some are treated properly, but many experience real, terrible suffering leading to death. In September this year, at the port of Trieste in northern Italy, RSPCA inspectors recorded on film, for all to see, a plethora of abuses to animals after long journeys across Europe. Sheep, for instance, were starved and dehydrated after a long journey, and then unloaded into a holding pen. The water troughs in the pen were so high that the animals were unable to drink from them—what meanness. Dying sheep, exhausted and stressed after one journey, were reloaded without rest on to another vehicle to begin the same nightmare all over again. Dead sheep were dragged off a lorry, which is evidence in itself. A horse was stabbed in the eye because it was reluctant to move due to severe exhaustion. Such scenes are so horrific and disturbing that I do not think that they should be shown on television before 9 pm. Indeed, I doubt whether they could be shown before 9 pm.

On one occasion, after pigs had made a 35-hour journey from Holland to Rome without rest, food or water—the three essentials of life—RSPCA inspectors witnessed them so exhausted after their nightmare journey that they were not able to walk steadily. They were falling from the vehicle while being unloaded. I have heard many personal testimonies by the late Glenda Spooner, a great fighter for the welfare of horses, who saw horses being unloaded after travelling long distances, stumbling and not behaving as they should, and receiving a severe thrashing for it. The beating was inflicted either out of bad behaviour, to indulge the miserable temperament and mood of individuals or out of sheer cruelty.

Such scenes, which appear commonplace, suggest that the European rules are rarely enforced. The abuses are so widespread that on almost every occasion that RSPCA inspectors monitor ports such as Calais they record yet another journey of 30, 40, 50 and even 60 hours without respite for the animals. Such journey times are in breach of European law. I have asked the RSPCA what intelligence or information it requires to follow such illegal journeys.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I agree with what the hon. Gentleman has said so far. His interest in horses is well known. Does he agree that we need to establish maximum journey times? I am sure that he will share my disappointment about the recent draft directive which failed because it extended the length of journey times above our legal maximum. Does he also agree that, apart from the cruelty of exporting animals, the problem also exports jobs from this country? Should not slaughter take place as near as possible to the point of production?

Mr. Greenway: I agree with the hon. Gentleman on both points. It is a tragedy that when, led by the Government, we were making good progress on journey times and on the general welfare of horses and other live animals, we have now moved in the oppositite direction.

I was talking about illegal journeys. The answer appears less conspiratorial than I had suspected. Inspectors wait at Calais or other ports, watching for the arrival of a multi-decked lorry. They look for two drivers, which is a sign of a long journey. When lorries arrive on ferries from the United Kingdom, up to 800 sheep are loaded and the horrendous journey begins. Most disturbing of all is the fact that on almost every occasion the lorries have not been stopped once en route through several countries. Enforcement appears to be wholly mythical.

That begs the question that, if a handful of RSPCA inspectors can so easily find examples of cruelty and disregard for animal welfare, why should basic enforcement be such a problem? It is so easy to find examples of abuse that they should be picked up without the slightest difficulty. Some hard punishment for those involved would have a tremendous effect on a wicked trade.

I am aware that following yesterday's deliberation at the Council of Ministers, there is still much to be resolved on the live transport directive. I hope that equal weight will be given to enforcement and the basic limitation of journey times. Enforcement matters just as much as limitation; if that principle is not established, the lengthy and difficult negotiations will have been wasted.

The deliberations on the European directive on live transportation bring me to a matter about which I and the British Horse Society, on whose council I have served for 21 years, feel most passionately. That is the retention of the Minimum Values Order.

The fight against the trade in live horses and ponies has been going on for more than 100 years. The RSPCA, the British Horse Society, the International League for the Protection of Horses and others have sought to stem the suffering inflicted on thousands of old, decayed and worn-out horses, as they are described, sent across the channel for butchery in continental slaughterhouses. That was at one time a lucrative trade and many people were brought before the courts for transporting a horse in an unfit state. In 1900 alone, the RSPCA, secured 4,651 convictions for that form of cruelty to horses.

The Minimum Values Order has played a huge part, which cannot be over-estimated, in stemming that trade. Today's Minimum Values Order, which prevents the export of any horses valued at less than £495 or pony valued at less than £220 or any horse over the age of eight years, except in very limited circumstances, has proved a valuable weapon against cruelty.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nicholas Soames): Hear, hear.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support.

We have to remember that horses who were, and sometimes are, exported for slaughter have often done a lifetime's hard work and do not deserve that type of treatment. However, there is great worry in horse circles that our open border with the Republic of Ireland—to which the order does not apply, unfortunately—provides a back-door route to butchery and death for many horses. It is a worry because each year many horses are stolen from loving owners and are never recovered. It would appear that stolen horses can be transmitted to the Republic of Ireland without paperwork and could then be shipped to the continent for slaughter.

I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is in his place, because he and I have done a great deal of work together on that and many other animal issues.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for saying that. May I offer him a double congratulation this afternoon? I congratulate him on all the work that he has done for the welfare of animals; I also congratulate him on getting this Adjournment debate, and therefore perhaps preventing the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) from going out and—who knows—shooting a number of small furry and feathered things and eating them in even greater quantity.

Mr. Greenway: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the initial compliment.

Finally, I commend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for her determined stand during the live transport negotiations by refusing to accept a lowering of the high standards of protection for animals who are transported live to mainland Europe. That is a matter for great thanksgiving and congratulation and I welcome it warmly.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE

I hope that in future negotiations, the Government will seek to establish the important principle of maximum journey limit for animals destined for slaughter, as the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) so rightly said. That was supported by 271 votes to six in the European Parliament on Wednesday this week. More importantly, we must establish that the good practice of slaughter happens close to the point of rearing. The hon. Gentleman said it; I have been saying it for years, in the House and in many other places.

An eight-hour journey limit would allow any purchasers to reach a choice of slaughterhouses of proper standing. Furthermore, we must promote the carcase trade. It represents 80 per cent. of British exports and, as has been shown in a recent report on the economics of the trade, it costs only £1·20 to transport a carcase from the United Kingdom to southern France, but £6·25 to transport the sheep live. Those figures tell their own story.

It is also surely in our best interests for British lamb to be sold as British lamb—the best lamb in the world—and not sold in French butchers' shops masquerading as French produce. British farmers received not a penny more at market for the 2 million sheep who were transported live to the continent this year. Meanwhile, jobs in our slaughter industry decline and the needless suffering continues.

The other reason for a maximum journey limit is enforcement. Feeding and resting periods complicate the enforcement of such rules. Indeed, the dreadful case that was successfully prosecuted by the Ministry just two months ago—I congratulate the Minister on that—highlights the difficulty of enforcement. The transporter in question had submitted to the Ministry, as part of the export licence that was used then, details of the stopping points for resting and feeding the animals. However, on no fewer than 42 occasions, he breached the written guarantees on the treatment of the animals in his care.

On one occasion, no doubt to save time and money, the journey lasted 44 hours from Calais to Piannella in Italy during which time the sheep were not fed or watered. On another ocaasion, the same journey lasted 47 hours. I wonder whether that individual would have done that to his next of kin. However, in respect of 42 instances of false declarations, the transporter concerned—a Mr. Mills—was fined only £4,200 and £3,500 costs.

Mr. Morley: Disgraceful.

Mr. Greenway: I absolutely agree with the hon. Gentleman. The transporter concerned was fined £7,700 for the trails of suffering that he sanctioned. That is an outrage. I wonder how much Mr. Mills saved in respect of feeding costs and wages by completing those journeys without stops. I am sure that he must have saved quite a lot more than £7,700.

I hope that the penalties for breaches of the live transport rules will be toughened. We cannot let that cruelty pay and we should not allow traders who compromise the welfare of those animals to continue in that business. I am grateful for the opportunity to raise an issue about which many of my constituents, and the constituents of many other hon. Members, feel very strongly.

In the years to come, I hope that I shall not feel that I have to return to the issue to highlight further cruelty and suffering; a sensible and rational policy, well enforced, would safeguard Britain's reputation as the guardian of animal welfare without compromising Britain's economic interest.

1.46 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nicholas Soames): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) for his kind words and, in the Christmas spirit, I ask him to forgive me for the disagreeable manner in which I let him know that I had to give up a day that I intended to devote to matters relating to conservation in the north of England in order to answer my hon. Friend's debate. I am glad to have given up that day on this occasion——

Mr. Morley: And so are the animals.

Mr. Soames: They are not animals—they are birds.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North is a real expert on the matter. The horses and ponies of the United Kingdom, past, present and future, owe him a considerable debt for his great knowledge and quite exceptional contribution to the horse world which, as he mentioned, was recognised when the British Horse Society gave him one of its highest awards. My hon. Friend has served for 21 years on the British Horse Society, which is one of the most important bodies governing horses in this country. My hon. Friend's knowledge of the matter is well known.

I am also grateful for, and should like to acknowledge publicly, my hon. Friend's support and the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House, by and large—and certainly unqualified in the case of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North—for the very tough line that the Government have been taking in the European Community negotiations on the protection of animals during transport.

I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will recognise that what happened in Brussels over the past two days—which frankly was a most unsatisfactory result as far as animals are concerned—was no fault of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who laboured hard and long, as did the chief vet, his colleagues and the officials in the Ministry who spent months preparing for the Council, lobbying in Europe and trying to bring the other countries round to a more sensible and honourable way of thinking about the care of animals. It was a great sadness to all of us that we were unable to reach a conclusion. However, I will return to that point later.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, the treatment of animals in transport and elsewhere is a subject for which the British people have enormous vital, instinctive and entirely justified concern. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that the Government's approach fully reflects that concern. We are not prepared to accept proposals that would fail to improve the welfare of animals during transport; nor will we play politics on the way in which we arrive at such agreements. Negotiations are taking place with people who simply do not understand and who have a cultural and attitudinal difference from ourselves about the handling, keeping and using of animals. That is why my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food demonstrated the strength of our resolve this week in Brussels, when she refused point blank to accept a compromise proposal which failed to address our vital concerns.

I hope that my hon. Friend and Opposition Members will not mind if I rehearse the background to the negotiations, as they are complex and the situation bears careful thought.

In 1991, when the existing directive on the transport of animals was adopted, it was acknowledged as being incomplete. It lacked vital and, as my hon. Friend said, enforceable details on the intervals between rest, food and water for animals. This summer, the Commission published proposals to complete the directive based on advice from its own scientific veterinary committee. We regarded the proposals as a sound and prudent starting point for discussions. Pending implementation of the further rules, member states are permitted to have their own national rules.

Mr. Morley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Soames: I shall give way if the hon. Gentleman is brief.

Mr. Morley: I shall be very brief.

On the point about national rules and enforceability, the Minister will be aware that we had a brief discussion in Committee about the concept of a licensing regime for animal transporters. The Minister will know also that I have written to him further on that matter. I do not expect a response until he has had time to consider the point, but it might be useful if he would indicate whether it is a principle which might be worth examining further.

Mr. Soames: I cannot comment on that. I have seen the hon. Gentleman's letter, and I applaud him for following up where other people do not bother to follow up after making a suggestion. We shall study the proposal with care. I have no intention of commenting one way or the other on the principle. I shall be happy to talk to him about it later.

The United Kingdom has taken advantage of the right to use national rules, and we maintain a maximum interval of 15 hours between feeding and watering horses and farm animals. We have always made it clear that, in negotiations, we would seek a solution reflecting our standards.

The Commission's proposal set a maximum feeding and watering interval of six hours for horses. For other farm animals, the intervals varied between eight and 24 hours. In negotiations under the Belgian presidency, it soon became apparent that many member states had acute difficulties with the Commission's proposals. In addition, much attention was devoted to measures that could improve enforcement of the rules, and we were extremely keen to encourage that. Those aspects are of fundamental importance for the proper care of animals, and we were encouraged by the realistic approach demonstrated during that part of the discussions. There was general agreement that the proposals should be simplified in order to set a smaller number of categories of animals for which different feeding and watering intervals would be established.

In the initial stages of the discussion, it was pleasing to have the weight of our arguments accepted, because the presidency proposed rules that were indeed very close to our own ideas. In the final stages of the negotiations, however, it was clear that several member states would support only intervals significantly longer than those that we have maintained in the United Kingdom.

There was also pressure to reduce the eight-hour rest period during long journeys, which the presidency had proposed. The final compromise which was on offer failed to meet any of our vital objectives. Accordingly, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food made it clear in the Council that the compromise was wholly unacceptable to the United Kingdom and, as a number of other states shared our concerns, no agreement could be reached.

I shall read an extract from the communiqué that my right hon. Friend issued following the animal welfare discussions. It bears some reading.

She said:

> "Our vets had worked hard to try to establish satisfactory intervals for feeding, watering and resting animals during transport. They pressed for current United Kingdom national rules . . . to be adopted throughout Europe where the current maximum is 24 hours. We also pressed successfully to link health certificates and journey plans so that national authorities can more easily enforce those intervals.
> Going along with a package which was fundamentally flawed would have further prejudiced the welfare of those animals already most at risk. I was not prepared to support this. In the meantime, the United Kingdom's national rule of 15-hours maximum journey periods, between watering, feeding and rest will remain in place. We shall continue to press for these high standards to become the norm in all parts of Europe."

Mr. Harry Greenway: I wish to say how pleased we all are about that and how strongly the whole House and the whole country are behind the Government on the basic points that my hon. Friend the Minister is putting before us. We should make that clear.

Mr. Soames: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

The events have demonstrated once more the huge gulf which sadly exists between those countries in Europe that have an enlightened attitude to animal welfare, and others that see no need for improvements and have little interest even in talking about the subject. It is perfectly clear that the latter countries are the obstacle to progress and it is to them that the protests of animal welfare lobbyists need to be addressed.

I wish to say some harsh words about the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals which I regret having to say. I warned the RSPCA months ago that there was no point in its wasting huge sums raised from its hard-pressed supporters to run a series of advertising campaigns in this country promoting animal welfare. The RSPCA already has our support. We are the animals' friends in Europe. We are what stands between the animals and real cruelty in some of the southern states of Europe.

By pursuing that fatuous, money-wasting campaign, the RSPCA has failed to spend any money lobbying where it should have lobbied—in the capital cities of those countries which do not support our proposals such as Spain, Greece, Italy and France. It should have concentrated its efforts——

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Soames: No, I will not give way. I am sorry, but I must get on. The RSPCA really must concentrate its efforts where it can help the animals.

[Mr. Soames]

In addition to anxiety about the transport of farm animals, I fully understand and share the special regard for horses. Welfare interests help to ensure that the subject is kept on the European agenda by vigorous lobbying. The horse lobby is an example to the rest of the animal welfare world of how to get one's points across in Europe.

Following earlier talks in the Community, we had obtained agreement that our national rules on horses could continue. We have accordingly maintained our controls, which you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will know as the minimum value system for horses. That was one of our major achievements in the 1991 negotiations. The discussions in Brussels this week did not contain any proposals to place that agreement in jeopardy. Of course, the concern for horses extends far beyond Britain. There is great concern about the trade in horses between eastern Europe and the Community. We are most anxious that such trade should be conducted under proper and decent conditions, if it has to take place at all, so that those vulnerable animals do not suffer the indignity of being treated like junk. The 1991 directive already goes some way towards achieving that objective. It provides the authorities with powers to stop journeys if any animal is suffering.

The key point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North and the really important point with which the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) will agree with is that there is no point in any regulation in Europe on the welfare of animals if it is not properly enforced by the member states. Until we have a proper system of enforcement of the rules on transport of animals in Europe, any improvements that we might secure are not worth the paper they are written on. That is why every effort must be made to lobby the countries that oppose these ideas in order to secure the interests and welfare of animals throughout Europe.

In future negotiations, Her Majesty's Government will continue to seek the best possible standards of transport for all animals in the European Community and, above all —almost standing over that—a proper and decent enforcement regime so that the public in Britain and elsewhere in the Community, and everyone who minds about animals may have complete confidence that such matters are handled with the care, attention and decency with which they should be treated.

Perhaps most important of all is that everyone with an interest in improving standards should do everything possible to promote a more enlightened attitude towards animal welfare—an attitude which, is so seriously lacking in some other Community countries. Until that happens, we will fight with all the vigour and force at our command. We have the moral authority of a huge animal welfare lobby in this country, of whose views we are acutely aware. The trouble does not exist here.

I hope that my hon. Friend will continue to press, through his other interests, those countries that so flagrantly ensure that animal welfare is not properly attended to when animals are transported through their territory.

Mr. James Smyth (Extradition)

2 pm

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): I have been associated with many of the campaigns against miscarriages of justice that have resulted from the problems of Northern Ireland and the way in which those problems have spilled over into Great Britain during the past 25 years. I must start by making it absolutely clear that I do not for one minute believe that injusticies have been done only to nationalists and Catholics. Many miscarriages of justice have been perpetrated against the majority community and loyalists in the north and I have been associated with the campaign for the UDR Four.

Whereas in war, truth is the first casualty, in the dirty war that has been going on during the past quarter of a century, justice has been one of the first casualties, as the urgencies of the hour have tended to lead to unreasonable decisions that are taken without due regard for the facts.

My involvement in the case of Jimmy Smyth arose because I happened by chance to meet him and his defending counsel when I addressed an Irish Americans for Clinton rally, just before the November presidential elections in California. Following a discussion about the work that I had done in the House, I was asked to submit to the defence 242 questions that I have tabled in Parliament, 30 written questions, 13 oral questions and six of my speeches. That led to my being invited to appear to give evidence in court, as an expert witness on British Government policy. The Government may not have been terribly happy about that, but I seem to have spent a great deal of time examining British Government policy.

I must read into the record two decisions taken by the judge presiding over the case because they are very concise and easy to follow and enable me to boil down the essence of the matter very rapidly——

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): I beg to move, That strangers do withdraw.

Notice being taken that strangers were present, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to Standing Order No. 143 (Withdrawal of Strangers from the House), put forthwith the Question, That strangers do withdraw:—

The House proceeded to a Division: but no Member being willing to act as a Teller for the Ayes, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER declared that the Noes have it.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): They have been nominated. On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You asked for names for the Tellers for the Ayes and my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker) said, "Mr. Cecil Walker and Mr. John D. Taylor."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Both hon. Members have been in the House long enough to know that the Chair looks to one side for the Ayes and to the other side for the Noes. I looked to the right and there were no Tellers in position for the Ayes. The hon. Gentleman should know the rules of the House. The Tellers for the Ayes were not present.

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Livingstone: I hope that hon. Members who are interested in preventing this debate will not miss any of it. As I did not expect to continue my speech, I lost my place in my notes.

The case in question is taking place at the moment, and yesterday the closing written submissions were submitted by the defence and the prosecution. The court's written judgment is expected to be delivered some time after Christmas. Before I was so rudely interrupted, I was about to read into the record two accounts written by the presiding judge that perfectly capture the specific problems in understanding this case. They are two judgments by Judge Barbara Caulfield, a United States federal judge who was appointed by President Bush on the nomination of the Republican senator for California, Senator Wilson, who is now Governor Wilson. This is not some dear old radical hangover from the good old days of the new deal: it is a fairly recent judicial appointment under the Republican Administration.

This is the first airing and testing of the extradition treaty that was negotiated by Prime Minister Thatcher with the then President Ronald Reagan. The House will recall that the British Government were profoundly unhappy with the operation of the previous extradition treaty and, after considerable pressure by Mrs. Thatcher, an amendment was carried. It is under that that the case is being heard.

On 14 September 1992 the United Kingdom filed a formal request for the extradition of James Joseph Smyth to serve the remainder of his sentence for a 1978 conviction in Belfast, Northern Ireland. The case is being heard under the supplemental extradition treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of the United Kingdom which went into effect on 23 December 1986. That is quite specific. The treaty negotiated by Mrs. Thatcher with former President Reagan spells out that > "extradition shall not occur if the person sought establishes to the satisfaction of the competent judicial authority by a preponderance of the evidence that the request for extradition has in fact been made with a view to try or punish him on account of his race, religion, nationality, or political opinions, or that he would, if surrendered, be prejudiced at his trial or punished, detained or restricted in his personal liberty by reason of his race, religion, nationality or political opinions."

It is remarkable that such a wide-ranging defence opened up after Mrs. Thatcher's intervention, because that ruling effectively changed the way in which extradition cases would be heard. Now, the British Government and their conduct of policy are on trial.

Judge Caulfield issued a decision on 29 September 1992 on whether Jimmy Smyth should be granted bail. It examined the basic bones of the case, based on the judge's reading of the Diplock judgment that convicted Mr. Smyth in 1978. She stated:

> "Mr. Smyth has indicated that he will attempt to prove at the hearing that he is not guilty of the crime of attempted murder for which he was imprisoned in 1977. He will argue that his imprisonment was the result of his political views and religious background rather than his conduct. He has indicated that he will offer expert testimony regarding the due process problems of the Diplock court system which can lead to unjust convictions and did so in his case.
> This court has had an opportunity to review the opinion of the Diplock judge who convicted Mr. Smyth in 1978. The evidence against him was almost entirely circumstantial. The fact that the victim and his wife, who were purportedly in the presence of the perpetrators for ten to fifteen minutes, were unable to identify Mr. Smyth is noteworthy, as is the lack of any forensic evidence connecting Mr. Smyth to the crime scene. Despite the fact that numerous fingerprints were recovered at the scene none of them were Smyth's. Indeed, the only eyewitness evidence against Mr. Smyth was the testimony of an off-duty police officer who stated that he saw a man near the victim's house, lost him three times as he chased him in his car and eventually captured Mr. Smyth about a mile away from the crime scene. This is not a case where the defendant argues that the evidence does not establish his guilt beyond any reasonable doubt; rather it raises serious questions about the validity of Mr. Smyth's underlying conviction.
> Between 1972 and 1976, Smyth was detained on at least six occasions. Only once was he charged or convicted of any offence —that being in 1972 when he was sentenced to six months for disorderly conduct; a conviction that was overturned on appeal. On one occasion, Mr. Smyth was interned for an entire year without charges. He maintains that, during his detentions, he was beaten by police and military personnel.
> After Mr. Smyth's internment, his name was in the police files. He was stopped and questioned by police as many as four times per week while walking home. He was often put up against a wall, spread-eagled, and then soldiers or police would come up behind him and stomp on his feet. On one occasion, Mr. Smyth was kicked between the legs. On another occasion he was given two black eyes.
> Mr. Smyth has also offered to prove and has presented some evidence which indicates that his life was threatened by guards when he was imprisoned in the Maze. Such a threat was specifically noted in the opinion of Judge Babington, the Diplock judge who convicted Mr. Smyth.
> In addition, Mr. Smyth has offered to prove that other men who escaped from the Maze prison with him and have been released from prison have been killed by British military personnel and protestant Loyalists. He has further offered to prove that men from his cellblock who remained behind when he escaped were subjected to inhumane treatment. He has offered to prove that guard dogs were set on them and they were denied medical treatment for their resultant injuries."

Judge Caulfield concluded:

> "This case is distinguishable from other recent reported cases in which Irish nationals have fought extradition to the United Kingdom in that Mr. Smyth denies membership in the IRA. And indeed, the government has presented no evidence to indicate that Mr. Smyth has ever been charged with membership of that organization."

The case started to deteriorate when Mr. Smyth's counsel asked for discovery of certain Government documents. It seems quite remarkable that if we seek to extradite people from the United States that we should then ignore American court procedure and traditions in hearing the case. The defence asked for access to several Government reports. I shall quote once again from the judgment handed down by Judge Caulfield after the British Government refused to grant the documents.

Of the Stalker-Sampson reports, the report says:

> "The Stalker-Sampson reports arise out of the investigation of officers in the Royal Ulster Constabulary ("RUC") for the shooting deaths of six people in 1982 whom they suspected of being members of the IRA. The purpose of the inquiry was to determine whether or not criminal offences (involving, inter alia, the giving of false or misleading evidence and conspiracy to pervert the course of justice) had been committed . . . The UK maintains that the reports contain highly sensitive information regarding internal affairs investigations and the procedures and identity of security forces personnel.
> The Kelly report: In 1988, Charles Kelly, the Chief Constable of Staffordshire, was appointed to consider whether disciplinary charges should be brought against RUC officers of the rank of chief superintendent and below who had been identified by Stalker and Sampson as having committed criminal offences, including murder. The declarations of Patrick Mayhew, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, filed on June 7, 1993 and June 18, 1993, do not specificially invoke a state secret or national security privilege claim with respect to this report. Instead, Mr. Mayhew states that '[t]he public interest here is in the maintenance of an honorable, disciplined, law-abiding and incurrupt police force.' Mr. Mayhew's declarations not only fail to specify that he has read the report, but they also fail to specify that the report contains any state or national secrets.

[Mr. Livingstone]

> The Stevens Inquiry: . . . into allegations of collusion between members of the Security Forces and Loyalist paramilitaries. As a result of the investigation, the RUC confirmed that Security Forces personnel had disclosed to Loyalists photos of republican suspects and the names, addresses and photographs of more than 400 people from the Catholic community in Northern Ireland. With respect to the Stevens' Report, Mr. Mayhew's June 7, 1993 declaration states:
> 'So far the actual report is concerned, I am satisfied that its disclosure would be injurious on two grounds; firstly the integrity of the process of criminal investigations and the making of decisions as to prosecutions and secondly, the efficacy of the efforts of the Government of the United Kingdom to counter terrorism and the protection of persons involved in those efforts.'
> A summary of this report has been disclosed to Smyth; however, the court finds that the summary does not contain sufficient detail to aid Smyth in preparing his defense . . .
> The government of the United Kingdom, through the United States Attorney's office for the Northern District of California, has refused to produce any of the above-referenced documents to Mr. Smyth. The UK has also refused to permit an in camera review of the documents by the Court . . .
> In light of Smyth's strong showing of need for the documents and the vagueness of the UK's declarations invoking privileges from production, the court viewed that an in camera review of the documents was necessary . . .

That was refused by the British Government. It seems to me that it is not a good start to a case when one insults the judge by suggesting that the judge may not be someone that one would trust to review the documents.

The judgment continues:

> "The court welcomed any suggestion from the UK regarding the redaction of particularly sensitive information regarding the identity of activities of security forces personnel. In response, the UK has indicated that it would not be possible to redact the documents and declined to submit the documents for in camera review by the court."

In conclusion, the judge ruled:

> "For the foregoing reasons, the good cause appearing therefrom, the court grants Smyth the following presumption:
> (1) Catholic Irish nationals accused or found guilty of offenses against members of the security forces or prison officials are subjected systematically to retaliatory harm, physical intimidation and death in Northern Ireland.
> (2) Members of the security forces in Northern Ireland either participate directly or tacitly endorse these actions."

That is the result of the British Government's failure to co-operate with the court and provide the documents. The court has conducted its business on the basis that those presumptions are taken as true. I submit that that represents a gross misconduct of the British case. I hope that we shall hear today which politician, and at what level, decided that those documents should not be submitted to the court, not even in camera, for the judge to consider.

As the case wound its way through the courts, the problems associated with it were compounded by the fact that, on 31 occasions, British Government witnesses refused to answer direct questions in court. That created the impression in America that those officials were rather like the godfathers who appear in mafia movies and refuse to answer questions on the ground that they might incriminate themselves. I should like to be told which politician, or Minister, was responsible for deciding that British Government officials should refuse to answer questions on oath in an American court.

The evidence against Mr. Smyth is flimsy and I believe that he is innocent. Normally, no IRA member denies membership of the organisation; rather he or she refuses to co-operate with the court system. Those IRA men who escaped from the Maze along with Mr. Smyth went back to bombing and killing, but he got to America, married and settled down to become a painter and decorator. There is nothing in that to suggest that Mr. Smyth is guilty of the crime of which he is charged. He was convicted at a time of hysteria when anyone whom the security forces considered to be a threat was likely to be convicted, on virtually no evidence, in a Diplock court.

The final evidence in my case is absolutely damning. On my advice, I suggested that the American court should call Captain Fred Holroyd as a witness. The House will be aware from the many other questions that I have put in the past that he served for two and a half years in Portadown with distinction and courage. He operated many agents —who put their lives on the line—in the area on behalf of MI6.

Fred Holroyd appeared in court and gave testimony. The British Government, however, were unable to question him because, although they had been given a week's notice, they claimed they did not have enough time to prepare detailed questions. They had no rebuttal to the evidence of Fred Holroyd. Given that the row has gone on for 20 years, it is completely unacceptable for the British Government to say suddenly that they did not have time to prepare questions to challenge his evidence.

I believe that Fred Holroyd finally got his day in court. The British Government had no case to answer the charges that he has made for years, for which he has been rubbished and his reputaion smeared by the British press.

As I came out of the American court I was met, as the House can imagine, by a large number of British journalists and we held a press conference. They asked me whether I had been traitorous and suggested that my behaviour had been outrageous. I can back to them with one simple reply, "Was there anything that I said in court which you would say was untrue?" Not one journalist could point to such an instance.

The conduct of the case has not just been mishandled, but it has damaged Britain's reputation. The Government have pursued an innocent man who is now suffering severely from ulcers after years of worry and strain. I hope that when Mr. Smyth wins his case, as I expect him to do, the British Government will recognise that they made a mistake. They have pursued an innocent man. I hope that they will not drag him through further years of doubt and worry, which will damage his health. I hope that they will let the case drop.

I am sorry that I have overrun my time. I have tried to squeeze my remarks into a shorter speech, but it is not my fault that we have such a problem.

2.22 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Sir John Wheeler): It is customary on these occasions to congratulate an hon. Member on securing an Adjournment debate and I do so now.

In the limited time available to me, I shall try to catch up on some of the points that the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) has made, even though his recollection of the proceedings in San Francisco is highly selective. The hon. Gentleman referred to the allegations of a Mr. Fred Holroyd. Her Majesty's Government had 48 hours' notice, not a week, of Mr. Holroyd's appearance before the court in San Francisco. He gave evidence and he repeated and embellished allegations that he has made over a number of years and which are certainly now well known and in the public domain.

Rather than having his day in court, I am afraid that Mr. Holroyd departed from it. Before the Government could cross examine him and call witnesses to refute some of his extremely serious allegations, he claimed that he had a more important engagement elsewhere. He decided to leave San Francisco rather than to face cross-examination. The judge, in her wisdom, accordingly struck Mr. Holroyd's evidence from the court record—so much for the testimony of Mr. Holroyd.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Stevens report and the allegation that Her Majesty's Government refused to disclose aspects of that report during the court proceedings. It is important to deal with that issue at the outset of my remarks. Her Majesty's Government refused to disclose or to discuss the report because it is entirely irrelevant to the issue in the Smyth case. The issue is whether a terrorist who is convicted of attempted murder and who escaped from prison should be returned to Northern Ireland to continue to serve his sentence. In any event, Her Majesty's Government would not disclose or discuss the Stevens report because to do so would give information to terrorists about security and intelligence structures in Northern Ireland that could lead only to more death and destruction. I cannot believe that any Member of the House would wish to see that continue.

I am grateful to have the opportunity to respond to some of the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the San Francisco trial in which Mr. James Smyth is engaged. It will help the House to know that Smyth was convicted in 1978 of a number of offences including the attempted murder of a prison officer, John Carlisle, who was shot at in his home in Belfast. For his part in the offence, Smyth was sentenced to 20 years imprisonment.

In 1983, Smyth participated in the violent, mass breakout from the Maze prison with 37 other prisoners. He was subsequently arrested by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on 3 June 1992 in San Francisco, where he had lived for eight years. He had in his possession a false passport in the name of a person who has been dead for many years. He was charged with making a false passport application with another Maze escaper, who had been arrested on the same day. A third Maze escaper, Paul Brennan, was arrested in California in January.

The Government's policy is to return all fugitive convicted terrorists to custody. All three men were convicted of serious crimes and Her Majesty's Government seek the return of all of them. James Smyth's extradition hearing is being dealt with first. It will be the first terrorist case that has arisen since the 1986 United States—United Kingdom supplementary treaty, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. That treaty was negotiated between the British and American Governments to eliminate the so-called political defence. That defence enabled Provisional IRA terrorists to escape extradition by claiming that their offence had a political motive. If it were not for that treaty, James Smyth might have argued that his attempted murder of a prison officer was a political offence and he might have escaped extradition on that basis.

I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members will agree that the 1986 supplementary treaty was an important advance in international co-operation against terrorism. In James Smyth's case, on which the judge has not yet decided, Smyth is arguing that, on return to Northern Ireland and after his release from prison there, he will suffer punishment, detention or restrictions of his personal liberty. Smyth says that that is because he is Irish, Catholic and a nationalist. I can tell the House that the Government have contested that argument resolutely. James Smyth will suffer no such thing. He will be fairly and properly treated in prison, as he was before he escaped; and when he is eventually released, he will be free to go about his business like anyone else in Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom.

Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware that the hon. Member for Brent, East, as he disclosed, took it upon himself to give evidence on behalf of James Smyth in San Francisco in October. Hon. Members may recall that the hon. Gentleman told the court that, once elected, the British Government have powers similar to those of the old eastern European regimes. That may surprise hon. Members.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

NON-DOMESTIC RATING BILL

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Non-Domestic Rating Bill, notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. Chapman.]

Organ Donation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Chapman.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this most important subject in this, the last debate of 1993. I do not believe that it could have been better timed. As people look forward to sharing Christmas with their families and to what 1994 has to offer, one group will be looking to the new year with hope but also with fear and trepidation. I refer to the 5,500 people awaiting organs for transplant operations. Unfortunately, approximately 1,300 will die next year because a suitable organ will not be found.

The Government have gone some way towards trying to find more donors for people waiting for operations—with the introduction of the donor card scheme in 1971, for example. But even with that scheme, approximately 40,000 people have died waiting for an organ since 1971. We can put that into perspective by comparing it with the 3,111 people who have been killed in Northern Ireland during the same period. We are talking about a needless waste of life—a tragedy being played out. I use the word "tragedy" purposely; it need not happen.

One reason why there is such a shortfall between organs needed and organs available is that the number of road deaths in this country has declined dramatically over the years, with the use of seat belts, air bags and motor cycle helmets. We now have some of the safest roads in the world. The House will appreciate that I am not complaining about that, merely referring to the reality. The most recent figures show that the United Kingdom had 81 road accident deaths per million people; Germany, 117 per million; France, 168 per million; and Spain, 172 per million. My concern today is to ensure that those people whose lives are cut short can lengthen and improve the quality of the lives of others.

The situation was brought home to me by the BBC 2 "40 Minutes" programme entitled "Will they ring tonight?" No one who witnessed the brave struggle facing thousands of families in this country daily and hourly as they wait for the telephone to ring—to be told that an organ has become available and that their life chance has arrived —can have failed to be moved. I have nothing but admiration for the families who miraculously discover the inner strength to cope with the pressure that is put on them. Stress and uncertainty greet their every waking hour. We must also not forget the stress experienced by doctors and nurses, as they see their patients fading away.

We have an opportunity to ease those people's pain. We have at our disposal the ability to give them a better chance of life. We cannot stand by. We do not have the moral choice to turn our backs on these people: we have to act.

I pay tribute to the amazing skills of our surgeons, doctors and nurses, who help to perform these miraculous operations. In 1992, 1,614 kidney transplants, 301 heart transplants, 53 heart and lung transplants, 89 lung transplants and 501 liver transplants were performed.

John Wallwork—whose father lives in my constituency —performed the first heart and lung transplant in the country. He works at that great centre of excellence, Papworth. He and others like him are testament to the high level of service and care available in hospitals in Britain today. It is thanks to their ability and dedication that the success rate of transplants is so high.

Notwithstanding that success rate, the number of people waiting for transplants, as at 30 March 1993, is almost 4,500 for kidneys, 270 for hearts, 231 for lungs and hearts, 124 for lungs and 109 for liver transplants.

The public's goodwill towards donating organs is evidenced by the number of people who have filled out an organ donor card—approximately 18 million people—but, unlike the American Express card, unfortunately not everyone never leaves home without it. In too many cases, the card is not available when needed.

The Government's commitment to the scheme is unquestioned. I applaud the campaign that took place earlier this year, on which the Government spent more than £1·5 million, to raise the profile of the donor card scheme, but we must harness the technology currently available to bring the organ donor scheme into the 21st century.

When I first considered how a scheme that matched organs to patients could be devised, I thought of using a normal credit card on which there would be stamped a heart symbol, so that in an emergency or accident doctors would know that the card holder wished his or her organs to be donated. Then I thought about why we needed a card. We use computers to store data on virtually every subject; why not use a computer to register organ donors?

The driver and vehicle licensing centre in Swansea has a computer that registers 35·5 million car licence holders; perhaps that computer would be appropriate for the scheme. The national insurance computer has an enormous capability; perhaps that could be utilised. The technology —into which hospitals could tap to find out what organs are available and match them to waiting patients—is available.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will know of the scheme that is operating in Wales called "Lifeline Wales". That scheme was launched by the Princess of Wales in 1986 and currently has 300,000 entries on its computer. The information on its computer is made available to intensive care units and neuro units in Wales. The computer can store up to 6 million entries, so even that scheme has a long way to go.

For any scheme to be a success, it must be sold well and the advantages of registeration to the nation spelled out. The donor message should be targeted towards certain groups, particularly young people. That could be achieved by advertising in magazines that are read by young people, or by advertising on television or by being featured in television programmes that are watched by them. Radio 1 recently ran a campaign to raise the profile of the problem of homeless people, which I heard on the Lynn Parsons show. It was so successful that it had to be extended so that more people could participate. The organ donor scheme could be equally successful if we target it carefully.

The two ten-minute Bills that were introduced this year promoting the opt-out scheme—under which it is assumed that people wish their organs to be used after their death unless they say otherwise—are evidence of the importance of the subject. Similar schemes are operated in Belgium, France and Austria. I oppose that measure: an assumption that inaction means consent is not good enough—we have to persuade people to come with us, not hope that the mass of people will slip into the system because they had not noticed that it was there. It would also lead to confusion for relatives—particularly if they are to be consulted about the scheme—and further pressure would then be put on doctors to negotiate with them.

Mr. Robert Johnson, a doctor working at Manchester royal infirmary, told me yesterday that he believed that doctors should be trained far more in the skills of coping with bereaved relatives when seeking their permission to use organs. He had recently attended the European donor hospital education programme in France; he said that he had learnt more in two days than in his entire previous working life. I believe that, if we can ensure that far more of our doctors are given an opportunity to take part in such schemes, we may be able to reduce the number of instances in which people are so shell shocked by the sudden death of a relative that they refuse to allow that relative's organs to be transplanted, although he had filled in the donor card.

Mr. Johnson also said that we must ensure that intensive care beds are made available and manned, giving a better chance to those who are critically ill, and also ensuring that those people's organs are in perfect condition should they die.

I cite two cases of brave young people who chose to donate the gift of life. One was a 10-year old called Paula. Last year, after being informed that she had a brain tumour, she told her mother that she wanted to donate her organs so that others could benefit. An eight-month-old baby girl received her liver; her heart went to a 57-year-old man; two teenagers received her kidneys; and her corneas went to two other people.

The other case is that of Peter Cox, who died four years ago aged 24. I pay tribute to his family, who have helped me with my campaign—his sister Christine, and his father John. Christine recently wrote this about her brother:

> "My brother Peter was born in Wolverhampton on 21st September 1965. He was educated at Malvern Boys College and graduated in Civil Engineering from Nottingham University. Pete was a keen Wolves supporter and enjoyed running the London Marathon in under 4 hours one year, an accomplishment I was unable to equal!
> Pete was 23 when he was found to have an inoperable brain tumour. It was particularly hard to understand since he had been healthy, brilliant, good and kind with a terrific sense of humour. Moreover, he was totally unselfish and always thought of others before himself.
> He was certainly one in a billion. Throughout his illness Pete remained brave and positive without complaining once about the difficulties and the pain he was experiencing. When the Specialist told us that the fight was lost and medication should be stopped, it was Peter who told us that he wanted to die as long as others could benefit from his organs. To our knowledge, possibly 17 people did and with his ultimate gift he saved lives and improved the quality of life for not only the recipients but their families as well.
> Peter died aged 24 on 12th November 1989."

One of the recipients wrote to Christine Cox afterwards. He said:

> "I have been in limbo for 6 years and now thanks to your nurses on the unit, I can start my life."

The quantity of life is obviously important, but the quality of life makes the quantity worth while.

I remind the Minister that Christmas—which is only a few days away—is a time for giving as well as receiving. Today, he has the opportunity to play Father Christmas to thousands of people by helping those who are able to give to do so, and allowing those in need to receive. I hope that he will take that opportunity. I believe that there is nothing in the world more precious than the gift of life; I plead with the Minister to give these people some good news this Christmas.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) for the moving way in which he presented his case. I am very pleased that for the last topic for 1993 he has chosen the subject of organ donation.

We can be justly proud of the way in which the organ transplantation programme has developed in this country. This debate is about courage and life—the courage of relatives who say yes and the life that is saved or enhanced by our willingness to sign and hold a small card.

Advances in medicine have enabled the doubling of kidney transplants in the past 15 years from 849 in 1978 to 1,640 last year. There are now in the United Kingdom more than 11,500 people with functioning grafted kidneys —more than in any other country in Europe. There were just three heart transplants in 1979; last year there were 325. The liver transplant programme did not start until 1982. In that year, there were 21 liver transplants; last year, there were 506. We owe an enormous debt of gratitude to the dedicated doctors, scientists, nurses and all others who helped to pioneer, develop and carry forward the transplantation programme. However, we should never forget that all those operations required donors—all volunteers or people who had died and whose relatives wished their organs to be used in that way. They, too, deserve to be remembered with deep gratitude.

It is perhaps ironic that advances in medicine similar to those that have enabled more transplants have contributed to the growing waiting list. In each of the past few years, there have been some 2,500 transplants of solid organs —kidneys, hearts, livers and lungs—but there are currently about 5,500 people awaiting such organs, of whom about 4,500 are awaiting kidneys.

The situation has arisen because advances in medicine have enabled many people to live who would previously have died. For example, more people than ever are receiving renal dialysis—more than 21,000 in 1991, an advance of 200 per cent. on 1978. However, the majority of dialysis patients would, I am sure, prefer to have a transplant. Many of them find dialysis unpleasant as well as inconvenient. If they were able to receive transplants, most of them would be able to lead fuller and much more independent lives. Anyone who attended the British Transplant Games in Newcastle this summer would have been tremendously impressed by the participants' ability not only to perform strenuous sports but to achieve such high standards.

For people awaiting hearts, livers and lungs, of course, there is at present no alternative. Without new organs, they will surely die. The remedy is to increase the supply of donor organs and the Government would dearly like that to happen. There is no shortage of funds or expertise for transplants; there is a shortage of donor organs. As my hon. Friend said, that shortage is in part due to the fact that the potential pool of suitable organs is limited. Generally speaking, organs are suitable only if they have come from people who have suffered sudden brain damage from a stroke, road accident or something similar. Organs must also be free of disease or other damage to be suitable for transplantation. That means that the maximum potential yield of suitable organs is only a few thousand a year.

Another problem is that the pool is shrinking. About a quarter of current donors are the victims of road accidents.

[Mr. John Bowis]

As my hon. Friend said, deaths from road accidents in the United Kingdom have, happily, been falling for many years; they have gone down from 5,554 in 1989 to 4,379 in 1992—a reduction of more than 20 per cent. That is welcome news, but it presents problems for organ transplantation. Deaths from other conditions that can result in organ donation are also going down—brain haemorrhages, for example. We are, therefore, faced with the prospect of fewer transplants unless the number of people prepared to be donors can be increased.

An important principle of organ donation, to which the Government have always subscribed, is that donation should be a matter of choice by the individual or his immediate family and that it should be a positive, altruistic gift. That was also recognised by the working group set up by the Government under the chairmanship of Sir Raymond Hoffenberg, a past president of the Royal College of Physicians, to consider ways of increasing the supply of donor organs. In its 1987 report, the working party made a number of recommendations. They included regional health authorities having plans and written guidance on organ donation and the identification of donors, education and publicity initiatives, education for medical and nursing professionals, a reimbursement scheme for donor hospitals, multi-organ retrieval teams and a donor declaration on driving licences. I am pleased to say that all those recommendations have now been implemented.

As I have said, one of the Hoffenberg recommendations was about publicity. Last year, we were able to increase the Department of Health's budget for organ donation publicity to £350,000. That has been used for a variety of purposes, including providing publicity material to charities, funding the Freefone advice line, research, exhibitions and displays, and publicity for ethnic minorities. In addition, the Department of Health funded the prime time television campaign last March. Given that the pool of potential donors is shrinking, it is vital to maintain publicity and, if possible, to increase the numbers.

At this point, I pay tribute to the many voluntary organisations that do so much valuable work to publicise organ donation. The Government must and will play their part, but not nearly so much could be achieved without the help of the voluntary organisations.

One of the main ways in which people can indicate their wish to be donors is by means of the donor card. People sometimes claim that the donor card scheme is not effective, or there would be more transplants. I disagree. Research has shown that the card is well known and popular. It is excellent publicity and good value for money and there can be no doubt that it has made a major contribution to the cause of transplants over the years. However, research has also shown that although about 70 per cent. of adults claim to favour the scheme, only about 25 per cent. claim to carry the card at all times. That underlines the point that my hon. Friend made. I suspect that the true figure is probably somewhat less.

That can cause hospitals considerable problems. It is, of course, possible to find out whether a person wished to be a donor even without a donor card, but the presence of a card makes life a lot easier for hospitals. That is why the department's publicity states:

"carry your card at all times"

—but unfortunately, many still do not.

In that connection, as my hon. Friend has pointed out, a computerised register of organ donors would be a help. That would enable hospitals to ascertain quickly whether a person is a donor. We are considering carefully options for such a register and we will consider the ideas that my hon. Friend has put forward today. We hope to make a decision early in 1994. I am not sure whether Father Christmas is allowed to arrive after Christmas as well as on the eve, but if my hon. Friend will allow him that latitude I am sure that he will see what he can do.

Whether or not a patient has a donor card, doctors invariably establish with his or her next of kin that they are content for the organs to be donated and will not proceed if the relatives object. That is common practice even in countries that operate opt-out schemes, where the presumption is that one is willing to donate one's organs unless one specifically expresses a wish not to. The reason for that practice, which in the United Kingdom and many other countries is not a legal requirement, is that certain people have strong religious or other beliefs in the integrity of the human body after death and we respect those views. Doctors also fear that families could be profoundly shocked if they discovered that their loved one's organs had been removed without their consent. The whole organ donation programme could be damaged if such a thing were to happen.

I am informed that refusal is virtually unknown if the relatives know that the deceased wished to donate. The problem is that relatives often do not know and it is hardly surprising that in their state of grief some of them refuse. In fact, refusal by relatives who do not know is the biggest single reason why suitable organs are lost to the transplant programme. About 30 per cent. of families who are asked refuse in that way. That is a loss we can ill afford. My Department is therefore funding a study into the reasons why relatives refuse. The study is expected to be completed by July of next year.

A number of people have called for a presumed consent or "opting out" system under which anyone's organs could be taken unless they had registered their objection. However, there is no consensus support in the medical profession or in the public generally for a system which would make retrieval of organs a presumed right on the part of the state. The evidence from countries where it is used seems to be that, after an initial increase, supply drops off as a result of people opting out—perhaps as a result of the publicity surrounding the introduction of such a scheme. It is also probable that even if such a scheme were introduced, doctors would still continue to consult relatives.

Another suggestion has been the "required request" which has been introduced in some states of the United States of America. That legislation requires doctors to ask relatives in every case if they may remove organs. Results so far are not encouraging and enforcement has been a problem. Doctors may judge that in some cases it would be inadvisable to approach relatives and we must respect that judgment.

In response to a point made by my hon. Friend, may I say that my Department is funding a pilot project in teaching doctors and nurses about techniques of approaching relatives. I hope that that will play a big part in enabling doctors to reassure relatives and to encourage the 30 per cent., to whom I referred, to be more willing to give their consent.

The standard of British transplantation services is second to none in the world, not least because those services have developed cautiously and responsibly. Survival following transplant is now 10 years in 85 per cent. of cases and the improvement in quality of life is enormous. Great progress has been made in the short period since transplantation began. I am sure that the House will want to join me in paying tribute to the dedication and skill of all those who have played a part in this story of success and to thank all those who, by their extraordinary generosity, have donated their organs to help others.

Madam Speaker, as I wish you, my hon. Friends, all hon. Members, Officers and staff of the House the very warmest of good wishes for Christmas and the coming year, there is one present that I hope everyone in the House and beyond it will consider: please give blood for Christmas. We need 10,000 donations every day. In every sense, such a donation, with the carrying of a donor card, really would be a present for life.

Madam Speaker: May I reciprocate by placing on record my good wishes for a merry Christmas to all hon. Members, Officers and staff of this House and I wish them a very happy and, if I may say so, peaceful new year.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes to Three o'clock.

Monday 6 December 1993

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Public Libraries (Hansard)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information he has received on the cancellation by public libraries of subscriptions to Hansard due to shortage of funds; and what steps he is taking to ensure the public access to the Official Report via public libraries is maintained with sufficient resources.

Mr. Sproat: I have received no information from library authorities, or from any other source, that public libraries have cancelled Hansard subscriptions. The responsibility for providing public library services, and for choosing their stock, rests with local library authorities, most of which provide an extensive range of official publications—among them, Hansard.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Sproat: The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government Departments are stated in the HMG IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method—CRAMM—and baseline security for IT systems—BSITS—risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the HMG IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation for some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

NAO and PAC

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Sproat: My Department, which was established in April 1992, has not yet reviewed the full range of files inherited from former parent Departments and it is not possible to give a figure for those bearing a marking "Not for NAO eyes". Since April 1992 DNH has opened a very small number of new files with this marking.

The marking "Not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

Film Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list those London boroughs of which he is aware which (a) have fully dedicated personnel working to attract film production companies to locations and facilities in their area and (b) which do not have such facilities.

Mr. Brooke: I am informed that no London borough has personnel dedicated solely to this work, but all have staff who combine it with other tasks such as press, marketing or sponsorship work.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps he is taking to ensure that overseas film producers have access to a single co-ordinating body which is specifically intended to give advice on film locations and facilities in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The British Film Commission, which is funded by my Department, is helping to finance a series of studies on the establishment of film commissioners in those areas of the United Kingdom, such as London, where no such bodies yet exist. As part of the research, business plans will be drawn up for use in raising funds for the establishment of commissions for London and elsewhere.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) if he will make a statement setting out the background of representations he has received and made about the future of the Elstree film studios;

(2) when he last met the owners of the Elstree film studios to discuss with them the current plans for the redevelopment of the site as a major retail outlet;

(3) what plans he has to make it his policy to seek to intervene to initiate discussions between relevant parties in an attempt to preserve the Elstree film studios as an ongoing commercial venture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The future use of Elstree studios is a matter for the commercial judgment of the owners, subject to any planning consent which may have to be obtained. Although I have received a number of representations about the matter, I have not met the owners of the studios and have no plans to intervene.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information he has concerning the financial and other incentives which are made available by the Republic of Ireland to attract investment by film production companies.

Mr. Brooke: This is not a matter for the United Kingdom Government, but the Irish authorities are happy to provide Members with the information sought and I will place it in the Library when it is received.

National Lottery

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which consultants have been retained by the Director General of the National Lottery to evaluate the lottery franchise bids.

Mr. Sproat: This is an operational issue and therefore a matter for the director general. I shall ask him to write to the hon. Member and place copies of his letter in the Libraries of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Computerised Criminal Records

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has held with the Police Complaints Authority or the Data Protection Registrar concerning computerised criminal records and their use by police officers.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Officials are in regular contact with the office of the Data Protection Registrar on these matters, but I am not aware of any similar discussions with the Police Complaints Authority.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions or dismissals of police officers for the persistent misuse of computerised criminal records have taken place in each of the last five years.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not collected centrally.

"Sunday Trading—A Guide to the Options for Reform"

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which bus company is portrayed in the photograph on page 18 of the White Paper "Sunday Trading—A Guide to the Options for Reform", Cm 2300.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Leaside bus company.

Prison Ships

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what lessons his Department learned from the incident involving the MV Earl William in 1987; what account has been taken of such incidents in his consideration of the proposal for prison ships; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The incident involving the MV Earl William highlighted the importance of safety issues in using ships for purposes of detention.

Health and safety issues are being fully taken into account in considering the option of using marine detention facilities to accommodate the rising prison population.

This is only one option being considered; no final decision has been taken on its feasibility.

Electoral Register

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has of the number of electoral registration officers who have implemented the voluntary scheme described in Home Office circular RPA 356, which requires records to be retained by electoral registration officers detailing who has been sold copies of the electoral register; and what plans he has to make the scheme compulsory.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information on the number of electoral registration officers participating in the scheme set out in circular RPA 356 is not collected centrally. There are no plans to make the scheme compulsory.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Howard: Figures for expenditure on television and press advertising for 1979-80 were given in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 25 May 1984, column 587 and those for 1984-85 were given in answer to another question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West on 19 December 1985, column 275.

Figures for radio advertising for 1979-80 and 1984-85 were given in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 19 November 1986, column 203.

Television advertising	3,722,469
Radio advertising	120,450
Press advertising	478,129

Estimate projected spent on advertising for the remainder of this financial year—1993-94—subject to confirmation is:

Television advertising	—
Radio advertising	—
Press advertising	212,000

Police Vests

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consideration is being given by the police security scientific development branch to the production of a standard for (a) a knife-proof vest and (b) a bullet-resistant vest; when he expects a standard to be adopted; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what offers his Department has received from manufacturers of knife-proof and bullet-resistant vests to pay for the testing and approval of such equipment; if he will make it his policy to take advantage of such offers to enable a testing programme to be carried out quickly; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The police scientific development branch—PSDB—has published standard procedures and criteria which it uses in assessing both types of vest.

No offers have been received from manufacturers to fund the testing of such equipment. It is primarily for chief officers of police and their police authorities to decide on the equipment to be used in an individual force. PSDB carries out tests on such equipment as part of its function as a research and development organisation and gives advice to police forces on the equipment's performance and characteristics. Charging manufacturers for testing products would compromise the PSDB's independence and reduce its capability to respond to the requirements of the police and the Home Office.

Jack the Ripper Diaries

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what inquiries have been conducted by the Metropolitan police into the alleged diaries of Jack the Ripper; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if the report of the Metropolitan police on the Jack the Ripper diaries has been sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand from the Commissioner that the Metropolitan police have conducted inquiries into the origin and authenticity of the manuscript diary purporting to have been written by Jack the Ripper, and into the circumstances surrounding the publication of the manuscript. A report has been prepared and will be submitted shortly to the Crown Prosecution Service.

North Wales Police

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many additional police officers were (a) sought by and (b) authorised for the North Wales police in each year since 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is set out in the table:

North Wales Police	Number of posts applied for	Number of posts approved
1989-90	31	4
1992-93	30	17
1994-95	58	0

My right hon. and noble Friend wrote to the hon. Member of 1 December, letting him know that there will be no establishment increases next year, and explaining a number of initiatives which will allow forces to increase their available operational resources during 1994-95. A copy of that letter has been placed in the Library.

Forced Subject Access

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to make forced subject access a criminal offence; and what estimate he has of the scale of the use of forced subject access.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The issue of enforced subject access is dealt with in the draft EU directive on data protection which is currently under negotiation in Brussels. The Government will review the position in the light of the outcome of that directive. No firm figures for the use of enforced subject access are available, but the Data Protection Registrar estimates that a substantial proportion of subject access requests in certain sectors may be instigated by third parties.

Visa Application Interviews

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of (a) men and (b) women who were waiting for interview for (i) settlement, (ii) education and (iii) visitors' visas at Bombay, New Delhi, Karachi and Islamabad on 22 November.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The latest available information on settlement queues and non-settlement applications awaiting first interview for posts in Pakistan and India relates to 31 October 1993 and is given in the table. No information is available centrally on the gender of applicants.

[4] Re-applicants.

Information on the number of applicants in Karachi is not available centrally but all applicants are expected to receive a first interview within three weeks.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of (a) men and (b) women remand prisoners being held in police cells in England and Wales as of 22 November.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 6 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of remand prisoners held in police cells as at 22 November.

A total of 17 prisoners, all male, were held in police cells on 22 November. All 17 were received into prison custody the following day.

Home Leave

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many convicted criminals have failed to return from home leave in each of the last five years; and for what crimes they had been convicted;

(2) on what criteria convicted criminals are allowed home leave; and upon whose judgment home leave is granted;

(3) in which year the system of home leave was instituted; and how many convicted criminals have committed further offences while on home leave since the system was introduced;

(4) if he will indicate what representations he has received regarding the abuse by convicted criminals of home leave.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Bob Dunn, dated 6 December 1993

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the grant of home leave to offenders and the availability of statistics concerning prisoners who have committed offences or absconded whilst on home leave.

It is understood that the home leave scheme was introduced in the 1950s as a means of enabling suitable prisoners to have an opportunity to prepare for release as part of their throughcare and reintegration into society. Since then, there has been little change to existing policy and practice, which is set out in Circular Instruction 43/92, a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library. This offers guidance on the operation of the scheme to governors who are responsible for deciding, in the light of all known available information about a particular offender and the risk which he or she may present to public safety, whether it would be right to sanction the privilege of home leave. The operation of the current scheme is currently being reviewed by a working party which is expected to report shortly.

We are currently considering how statistics on offences which are committed by prisoners and other home leave failures can be best collated centrally. I regret to say that at present the information you request is not available.

Security Cameras

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will publish crime figures for those local authorities which have taken steps to install security cameras for the 12 months prior to and after installation;

(2) which local authorities have, or are considering the installation of, security cameras in their town centres, in association with the police.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not available.

Illegal Weapons

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been arrested in Liverpool in connection with stockpiling of illegal weapons in each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information is not available in the form requested.

National Audit Office and Public Accounts Committee

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Howard: There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

No central record of files marked "Not for NAO eyes" is maintained. The information could be obtained only by examining individually each of the 1·5 million extant files in my Department, and could therefore only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

The marking "Not for NAO eyes" is used rarely and in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

Background Radiation

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the locations of the nuclear (a) out-stations and (b) central control units funded by his Department that monitor background radiation; and what other types of monitoring they are responsible for.

Mr. Yeo: I have been asked to reply. Background radiation in terms of gamma radiation dose rates is monitored by the radioactive incident monitoring network —RIMNET—operated by the Department of the Environment. The system currently has monitoring stations at:

Aberporth
Aldergrove
Aviemore
Benbecula
Boulmer
Brize Norton
Carlisle
Coltishall
Coningsby

System upgrade work, nearing completion, will increase the total number of RIMNET monitoring stations to 92. Its control centre is located at the Department's headquarters in Marsham street, London.

ENVIRONMENT

Bathing Water Quality

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce the results of the current year's bathing water quality monitoring; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 1 December to my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), Official Report, columns 558-59.

Water Charges

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether council tax bands will be used as the basis of assessment for water charges after the year 2000; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: It is for each water company to decide the basis on which it charges customers subject to the Director General of Water Services' powers in section 2 of the Water Industry Act 1991 to control discriminatory pricing. After 31 March 2000 companies may not use rateable value. During the passage of the Local Government Finance Act 1992, we gave a commitment to confine use of information on the council tax banding of individual properties to use for council tax purposes.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the water regulator about the charging for water by property bands standardised bills similar to the system used for the council tax.

Mr. Yeo: The basis of charging for water is a matter for the water companies. It is among the topics discussed at meetings between the Department and the Director General of Water Services.

Packaging Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to discuss with the Chancellor of the Exchequer opportunities to introduce financial incentives in support of mandatory targets established for industry to meet in reducing packaging waste and to promote recycling of packaging wastes.

Mr. Yeo: The Government believe that it should not be necessary to impose mandatory targets to achieve their objectives of reducing packaging waste and securing increased levels of recovery and recycling. In our producer responsibility initiative, we have given industry the task of devising the most cost-effective means of recovering between 50 and 75 per cent. of packaging waste by the year 2000. We expect industry to provide us by Christmas with a plan for achieving those targets.

We have indicated that, wherever possible, we will use economic instruments to secure our environmental objectives rather than regulation. Producer responsibility is one such economic instrument. Another possibiility which we are considering is the idea of a landfill levy, which could provide an incentive to reduce waste and encourage higher levels of recovery, including recycling.

Wedholme Flow

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the area, as a percentage of the peatland site of special scientific interest, of Wedholme Flow, covered by the agreement between English Nature and Fisons, where the commercial extraction of peat will be allowed to continue; and what assessment he has made of the effect on the level of biodiversity.

Mr. Yeo: One hundred and sixty hectares, some 21 per cent. of the Wedholme flow SSSI, will continue to be worked for peat extraction. In addition to the remaining uncut areas, English Nature has been actively managing 103 hectares of previously worked land since early in 1992. Site management staff report that recolonisation of cut-over areas is proceeding rapidly, following restoration of water levels. Biodiversity levels appear to be increasing.

Combined Heat and Power, Wales

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many combined heat and power plants are in operation in Wales; how many of these are of the combined-cycle type; and what proportion of delivered energy is provided by the plants.

Mr. Yeo: Latest estimates suggest there are now 59 combined heat and power—CHP—sites in Wales with a total installed capacity of approximately 190 MWe. Of these, none is believed to be of the combined-cycle type. It is estimated that, in 1992, on-site electricity generation from CHP plants in Wales was approximately 1,000 GWh. In addition to this, sales of electricity to consumers in Wales totalled 16,400 GWh. Therefore, over 5 per cent of electricity used in Wales is provided by CHP.

On a national level, CHP meets about 4 per cent. of United Kingdom electricity demand.

Recycled Materials

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is currently taking to establish new markets for recycled materials.

Mr. Yeo: The Government are encouraging the development of new markets by providing industry with an incentive to make greater use of recycled materials. Our producer responsibility initiative, launched in July, provides such an incentive by, for example, giving industry the responsibility for meeting targets for the recovery of packaging waste and bearing the costs of meeting those targets. We have made it clear that the industry's plan, which we expect to receive shortly, must include a willingness to increase demand for recycled material where it meets the appropriate standards.

The Government are also encouraging the development of new markets for recycled materials through the environmental technology innovation scheme, run jointly by my Department and the Department of Trade and Industry, and the DTI's environmental management options scheme and Euroenviron scheme. Grants awarded under these schemes include £835,120 to Anaplast to develop innovative technology for recycling mixed plastics and another of £638,218 to Bird Commercial Metals for a project which examines the potential markets for materials recovered from scrapped vehicles.

Volumetric Meters

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many domestic properties in each region had a volumetric meter installed on 1 October.

Mr. Yeo: The Director General of Water Services has information on the extent of metering for water.

Biodiversity

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to hold a review of policies to conserve biodiversity following the publication of the 1990 countryside survey.

Mr. Yeo: Countryside survey 1990 reports on the 12-year period leading up to 1990. Since 1990 the Government have set in place a range of positive policy measures in the countryside. The United Kingdom has also strongly advocated the integration of environmental considerations in the reform of the common agricultural policy.

In June 1992 the Prime Minister and over 150 other Heads of State or Government signed the convention on biological diversity at Rio de Janeiro. In response to the convention, the United Kingdom biodiversity action plan will be published in January. The results from countryside survey 1990 have played a part in setting priorities for that plan.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will investigate the reasons for the biodiversity losses recorded in the 1990 countryside survey.

Mr. Yeo: My Department is undertaking further scientific work to understand causes of changes reported by countryside survey. Examples are: in collaboration with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, a project in Somerset levels to examine the effect of various fertiliser levels on plant diversity; in collaboration with the Economic and Social Research Council, a project at Wye college on the socio-economic factors that underlie the reported changes; and a project using a modelling approach to predict the effects of climate and policy changes on some of our rarer habitats.

Car Boot Sales

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers are available to local authorities to control car boot sales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1988—GDO—gives a general grant of planning permission for the temporary use of land for car boot sales for up to 14 days in any calendar year. More frequent use requires planning permission to which local authorities may attach conditions to protect amenity.

Local authorities may make a direction under article 4 of the GDO to withdraw this permitted development. Where this is done, a specific planning application would be needed for any temporary market.

Section 37 of the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 enables local authorities to require a month's notice of a car boot sale. This gives local authorities time to make any necessary provision to avoid disturbance or to make an article 4 direction; where it appears that there has been a breach of planning control —for example, where the 14-day period has been exceeded —the local authority may serve an enforcement notice requiring the breach to be remedied; at any time before an enforcement notice takes effect the local authority can serve a "stop notice" which has the effect of prohibiting any person on whom it is served from carrying out or continuing any specified operations on the land. Failure to comply with a "stop notice" is punishable in a magistrates court with a fine of up to £20,000.

Local authorities have a wide range of other powers to help them. These include powers under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to control noise and litter, powers under the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to regulate parking and powers under consumer protection legislation.

Asbestos

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has concerning the total annual consumption by the United Kingdom construction industry of (a) corrugated roofing material and (b) man-made slates; and what is the total estimated value of that consumption;

(2) if he will give a breakdown for each of the last 10 years for which figures are available of the percentage of (a) corrugated roofing materials and (b) man-made slates, used by the United Kingdom construction industry, and which were in each case made from (i) non-asbestos materials and (ii) materials including asbestos;

(3) what information he has about the reasons for the increasing percentage of total corrugated roofing materials and man-made slates which are manufactured from asbestos products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: Information in the detail requested is not collected by the Department.

Government Car Pool

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the annual cost of the Government car pool; what are the categories of expenditure; and how many cars and how many staff are in the pool.

Mr. Gummer: The Government car service currently has 25 pool cars and 27 pool drivers, which include back-up for Ministers' drivers. The annual cost of the GCS pool service is estimated at some £750,000, staff costs account for about 75 per cent. and vehicle costs about 15 per cent. of the total annual cost.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration has been given to sites, other than Gosport, for the construction by Nirex of a low and intermediate-level radioactive waste repository.

Mr. Yeo: In the 1980s, Nirex investigated the use of a disused anhydrite mine at Billingham in Cleveland for the deep disposal of long-lived intermediate-level radioactive waste and sites at Bradwell, Elstow, Fulbeck and South Killingholme for the near-surface disposal of low-level radioactive waste.

Investigations at Billingham ceased in 1985, when ICI, the owners of the mine, decided not to make it available to Nirex. Investigation of the other sites ended in 1987, when Nirex concluded that the economic advantages of separate near-surface disposal of low-level waste were not as great as had been thought and that it would be preferable to develop a multi-purpose deep site for low and intermediate-level waste.

Dounreay in Caithness and a site near Sellafield in west Cumbria, neighbouring the village of Gosforth, have both been considered as possible sites for the multi-purpose repository. At present, Nirex is concentrating its investigations on Sellafield.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the earliest date he expects that a waste repository for heat-generating nuclear waste will be operational in the United Kingdom; and which sites have been considered for such a repository.

Mr. Yeo: High-level radioactive waste is treated and stored at the surface for a period of at least 50 years, which will allow heat generated by the decay of radioactivity to reduce. Decisions about the subsequent management of the waste will be taken in due course.

Environmental Organisations

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the expected outturn of expenditure in the current financial year on (a) the National Rivers Authority, (b) Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and (c) the Countryside Commission; and what is the budgeted figure for HMIP for 1994-95.

Mr. Yeo: The expected expenditure outturn for 1993-94 is £444 million for the National Rivers Authority, £27·4 million for Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and £44 million for the Countryside Commission. The budget for HMIP for 1994-95 is £29.4 million.

Water Leaks

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of water supply was lost in each region through leakage through the water distribution system and what percentage from customer supply pipelines.

Mr. Yeo: The information requested can be found on page 27 of "The Cost of Water Delivered and Sewage Collected 1992-93", published in October 1993 by the Office of Water Services, a copy of which is in the Library.

NAO and PAC

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Gummer: The only category of file not available for National Audit Office view are those which relate to relations between the Department and the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee. This is fully in accordance with the standing agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office. This applies to 214 files out of 1·4 million.

Housing Action Trusts

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give the previous experience in the housing field of the current chairman of the Liverpool housing action trust; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what criteria are used in the selection of chairman of housing action trusts; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Housing action trust chairmen are chosen for the personal qualities and experience they can bring to the job, within the framework set out in schedule 7 to the Housing Act 1988. I am pleased with the progress the housing action trust has made under her leadership since it started earlier this year.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the public expenditure figures for housing action trusts from 1991-92 onwards, at 1992-93 prices.

Sir George Young: At 1992-93 prices, public expenditure on housing action trusts was £10·5 million in 1991-92 and £26·5 million in 1992-93.

The public expenditure baseline for the current and the three subsequent years are, on the basis of the latest available GDP deflator:

	million
1993-94	84·1
1994-95	82·1

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the present posts held by the chairwoman of Liverpool housing action trust and the total salaries received.

Sir George Young: The chairman of the Liverpool housing action trust holds one other post within my right hon. Friend's area of responsibility, namely a board member of the Merseyside development corporation. Board membership of the MDC attracts an annual remuneration of £5,030. Details of earnings relating to the HAT chairmanship were given in my response to the hon. Gentleman on 2 November 1993, Official Report, column 101.

Urban Development Corporation

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the public expenditure figures for urban development corporations from 1981-82 in 1992-93 prices in the same form as his answer of 3 November, Official Report, columns 208-9.

Sir George Young: Grant in aid paid to urban development corporations in England from 1981-82 to 1992-93 in 1992-93 prices, is set out in the table:

Year	£ million (at 1992-93 prices)
1981-82	68·5
1982-83	106·6
1983-84	156·0
1984-85	138·3
1985-86	121·6
1986-87	128·4
1987-88	[1]218·4

1991-92	622·5
1992-93	515·8

Toxic Waste

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the sites in England receiving imported toxic waste; and what was the level of toxic waste disposed of at each site for the year 1992-93.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 3 December 1993]: The amount of hazardous waste imported for disposal[1] at facilities in England in 1992-93 was as follows:

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of local authority housing tenancies available within (a) England, (b) each housing authority in England and (c) Yorkshire and Humberside for each year since 1980.

Sir George Young [holding answer 3 December 1993]: The information derived from local authorities' annual housing investment programme returns is given.

2. The information up to 1982 does not include vacant local authority dwellings that are available for letting.
3. The figures exclude nominations to housing associations.

I have also today placed in the Library a table giving corresponding figures for each local authority in England.

Desertification

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the next meeting of the intergovernmental negotiating committee for a convention to combat desertification is planned; when the draft resolution on desertification and regional instrument for Africa is expected to be finalised; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have been asked to reply.

The next meeting of the intergovernmental negotiating committee—INC—will be in New York from 17 to 28 January 1994. The United Nations General Assembly has directed that the convention is to be completed by June 1994. The INC has agreed that a regional instrument for Africa will also be completed by that date.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Private Medical Insurance

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much per person granted tax relief it costs to administer tax relief on private medical insurance.

Mr. Dorrell: The annual cost to the Exchequer of administering the tax relief on premiums under private medical insurance contracts averages 42p for each person granted tax relief.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what tax relief, rebates or allowances are received by companies offering private medical insurance to their staff.

Mr. Dorrell: The general rule when calculating the trading profits of a business is that a deduction is allowed for expenses incurred wholly and exclusively for business purposes. If an employer incurs expenditure in offering private medical insurance to employees, the expenses would generally qualify as a deduction under this rule as part of the remuneration package.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the cost to the Treasury of tax relief on private medical insurance in (a) 1990, (b) 1991, (c) 1992 and (d) 1993;

(2) what would be the total saving to the Exchequer of scrapping tax relief on private medical insurance.

Mr. Dorrell: The estimated costs in each year since 1990-91 are given in the table:

Year	Cost of tax relief on private medical insurance for those aged 60 or more (£ million)
1990-91	40
1991-92	60
1992-93	70

The estimated saving to the Exchequer if tax relief on premiums paid in 1994-95 was abolished is £85 million including administrative costs.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether private medical insurance premia will be liable to tax.

Sir John Cope: Under the proposals announced by my right hon. and learned Friend in his Budget statement, private medical insurance premia will be liable to insurance premium tax. Premia in respect of long-term insurance as defined in the Insurance Companies Act 1982 —which includes permanent health insurance and life assurance—will be exempt.

Black Economy

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to tackle the black economy.

Mr. Dorrell: Details may be found in the chapter entitled "Compliance" in the annual report of the board of Inland Revenue—copies of which were laid before Parliament on 29 September 1993.

Car Boot Sales

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if Inland Revenue officials routinely inspect the tax returns of those who trade frequently at car boot sales;

(2) what is his estimate of the amount of revenue collected in respect of business done at car boot sales;

(3) how many sellers at car boot sales are assessed for tax on their trading income.

Mr. Dorrell: The Inland Revenue does not record data which relate specifically to car boot sales.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Nelson: Nine press and publicity officers are currently employed in my Department.

Information for the years 1979-85 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was capital spending as a proportion of gross domestic product for each year since 1970.

Mr. Nelson: The latest estimates of gross domestic fixed capital formation and gross domestic product at current and constant market prices are available on the CSO database which may be accessed by the House of Commons Library. The relevant database identifiers are DECR and CAOB at current prices and DECU and CAOO at constant 1990 prices.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many visits abroad the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My predecessor and I have made the following visits abroad this year:

Date	Destination	Purpose	Cost of Chancellor's participation
18 January	Brussels	ECOFIN	£55
13 to 16 April	Tokyo	Meeting of G7 Foreign and Finance Ministers	£7,759
19 April	Luxembourg	ECOFIN	£296
28 April to 1 May	Washington	G7 Finance Ministers' and Spring meetings of IMF/IBRD	£4,703
21 to 23 May	Billund, Denmark	Informal ECOFIN	£709
6 to 7 June	Luxembourg	ECOFIN	£529+
5 to 9 July	Tokyo	G7 Summit	£4,346
12 July	Brussels	ECOFIN	£176
18 to 19 July	Germany	Meetings with Finance Minister; Bundesbank; and meetings with and speech to businessmen	£1,072
1 to 2 August	Brussels	ECOFIN	£70
12 to 13 September	Brussels	ECOFIN	£272
24 to 29 September	Washington	G7 Finance Ministers and annual meetings of IMF/IBRD	£0
8 to 10 October	Genval, Belgium	Informal ECOFIN	£700
24 to 25 October	Luxembourg	ECOFIN	£464
21 to 22 November	Brussels	ECOFIN	£189

The cost estimates provided take account of travel and subsistence and are net of refunds paid by the EC and the International Monetary Fund.

In each case, the purpose of the visit was to promote and defend British interests in discussions with overseas Governments.

Financial Services

Mr. Denham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what criteria are used in the selection of members of the board of the Securities and Investments Board who are to represent the interests of the public under the terms of the Financial Services Act 1986;

(2) when he expects to announce the appointment of new members of the board of the Securities and Investments Board;

(3) what assessment he has made of the proper balance on the board of the Securities and Investments Board between members representing the interests of persons carrying on investment business and the interests of the public.

Mr. Nelson: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the appointment to the board on 25 November of Lord Alexander of Weedon, QC, Mrs. Rosalind Gilmore, Mr. John Kennedy, Dr. Oonagh McDonald and Lord Stewartby and on 2 December of Mr. Andrew Winckler who has been appointed head of SIB's supervision division. My right hon. and learned Friend and the Governor of the Bank of England have taken this opportunity to restructure the board in line with the recommendations in Andrew Large's review of financial services regulation published last May "Making the Two Tier System Work". All board members are appointed in a personal capacity and do not serve as representatives of particular interests or associations.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when he expects the Personal Investment Authority to take over the responsibilities of current self-regulatory organisations;

(2) what action he is taking to rationalise the number of regulatory bodies governing the financial services industry;

(3) what action he is taking to ensure the swift and successful setting up of the Personal Investment Authority.

Mr. Nelson: I understand that the PIA intends to apply to SIB for recognition in the next few months.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he is taking to monitor the performance of the investment funds associated with endowment mortgages; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson: The Treasury has no role in monitoring the performance of investment funds.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to instruct the relevant regulatory bodies to introduce a statutory qualification for (a) tied insurance salespeople and (b) independent financial advisers.

Mr. Nelson: The Securities and Investments Board, the regulatory body which is the designated agency under the Financial Services Act 1986, recently approved new training and competence requirements.

Air Passenger Duty

Mr. McDonald: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of the regular scheduled passenger flights to the Scottish islands he estimates will be exempted from the air passenger duty from 1 October 1994; and if he will make it his policy to provide a general exemption for all regular scheduled passenger flights to and from the Scottish islands, and within the Scottish islands, regardless of the number of passengers that can be carried.

Sir John Cope: Based on October 1993 timetables, it is estimated that about a quarter of flights to the Scottish islands from the mainland and about three quarters of inter-island flights will be exempt from air passenger duty. The exemption relates to criteria for Civil Airports Authority airline licensing requirements. It would be difficult to justify relieving all flights in one particular area but not elsewhere.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Central Statistical Office will assess the costs and benefits of collecting, analysing and publishing a full geographical breakdown of invisible trade, country by country, on the same basis as that which is published on visible trade.

Mr. Nelson: The Central Statistical Office is currently reviewing with its data suppliers the need for, and the cost of, collecting more geographical detail on United Kingdom invisible trade. For some components of invisible trade, very detailed information is already available and published, for example, travel credits and debits. For other components, for example, financial services, such information would be expensive to collect and would impose a high burden on reporting businesses. In some cases, notably investment income, there are difficult conceptual problems—it is sometimes not clear who the foreign counterpart is for some types of transaction.

Given these difficulties the Central Statistical Office has no current plans to collect a full geographical breakdown of invisible trade country by country. The Central Statistical Office, however, keeps such matters under review.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his future plans for publishing detailed statistics of visible United Kingdom trade with each of the present and future individual member states of the EC.

Mr. Nelson: Regular publication of statistics of trade with individual members of the European Union has now restarted following the introduction of a new statistical system on 1 January. Detailed monthly data are available through marketing agents appointed by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. Summaries are published monthly in Business Monitor MM20A "Overseas Trade Statistics of the UK with the World". Details at commodity code level are published quarterly in Business Monitor MQ20, "Overseas Trade Statistics of the UK with countries within the EC". The Central Statistical Office will shortly begin publishing seasonally adjusted estimates of trade with individual members of the European Union—without any commodity detail—in its first releases and on their database, access to which is available through the Library of the House.

Data are available for countries which are not members of the European Union from a similar range of publication and sources.

NAO and PAC

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many files marked "Not for NAO eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for PAC eyes".

Mr. Byers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Nelson holding answer 3 December 1993]: Of the Treasury's 93,168 files dating from January 1987, 211 bear the marking "Not for NAO eyes".

This marking is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

TRANSPORT

London Underground (Power Failures)

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated cost to London Underground of the power failure on 24 November, including loss of income and the refund of fares, as well as costs directly attributable to the restoration of power supplies and the evacuation of passengers.

Mr. Norris: London Underground Ltd. currently estimates that the total costs which it will have incurred as a result of the power failure on 24 November, including loss of revenue, are likely to be around £2 million.

Press and Publicity

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many press and publicity officers are currenty employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Norris: The number of press and publicity officers currently employed in the Department of Transport and employed in 1985 is as follows:

	Number
Currently employed	21
Employed in 1985	17

Before 1984-85 the information division was a common service of the Department of Transport, Environment and Property Services Agency and information concerning the number of press and publicity officers working for the Department of Transport is not available.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Norris: The security requirements for information technology systems and services used by Central Government Departments are stated in the HMG IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method —CRAMM—and baseline security for IT systems—BSITS—risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the HMG IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation for some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

EC Transport Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what matters were discussed; what proposals were put forward by the United Kingdom; what decisions were taken; and what were the voting records of each member state at the European Transport Council on 29 to 30 November in Brussels.

Mr. MacGregor: My noble Friend Lord Caithness and I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council reached political agreement on a directive giving the force of Community law to provisions on crew training standards agreed in the International Maritime Organisation—IMO—and requiring enhanced standards of communication on board passenger ships and tankers. The Council also agreed the main points of a draft directive establishing common rules and standards for classification societies. My noble Friend emphasised the importance for maritime safety of setting both clear rules and demanding standards for these societies, and secured safeguards which will assist high quality societies such as Lloyd's Register to provide services throughout the Community. In response to concerns expressed by a number of member states, including the United Kingdom, the Commission undertook to make a statement for the minutes, making it clear that neither directive would affect the active participation of individual member states in the IMO.

The Commission reported on its intentions for EUROS, the proposed Community shipping register. Significant difficulties remain. The Commission will be bringing forward new proposals in which proposed financial measures are likely to be restricted to employment, training and fleet modernisation.

The Council agreed draft conclusions supporting a Commission fact-finding mission to west and central Africa to examine the existing system of unilaterally imposed cargo restrictions. The Commission is expected to bring forward, for future consideration by the Council, a new draft mandate for negotiations with the Governments of the countries concerned.

The Commission undertook to present, by the middle of 1994, a report on key issues arising in the field of maritime competition policy. A draft Council resolution on this issue was therefore not pursued.

The Council approved conclusions on the Commission's communication on road safety which pay due regard to the principle of subsidiarity. It also adopted a decision setting up a Community road safety database on which the United Kingdom and one other member state abstained. My noble Friend made it clear that the United Kingdom was not opposed to the principle of a Community road safety database, but was abstaining on the decision since we did not believe that the proposed Community data base would provide added value to existing national systems and would duplicate work being done in other international forums such as the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

My noble Friend referred to the recent coach and minibus accidents in the United Kingdom and to national concern about the current lack of compulsion to fit seat belts in such vehicles. He explained that the United Kingdom was evaluating the lessons to be learned from the recent accidents to see what action might be taken. The Council agreed, in principle, that 1995 should be the year of young drivers.

The Council reached political agreement on a directive establishing the general principles for the investigation of air accidents. It received an interim report on the work of the committee looking at the aviation industry, which considered that some airlines were facing problems, but that any reversal of the single market in aviation adopted during the United Kingdom presidency should be resisted. My noble Friend recommended that there should be no going back on this "third package", which should be quickly implemented in full. He made clear the United Kingdom's view that state aids distorted competition and cushioned their recipients from economic reality. The Council failed to agree a set of conclusions, but the presidency issued its own.

The Council reached political agreement on a draft directive which, from 1996, will harmonise the end-date of summer time at the end of October. This, in effect, will bring 10 member states into line with the current practice in the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. The United Kingdom expressed support for the substance of the directive, but entered a minutes statement to make it clear that, on grounds of subsidiarity, we would have preferred a recommendation to a directive.

The Commission reported on its work on transport links with Greece. The Council will return to this matter at a subsequent meeting.

A proposed mandate for aviation and road haulage negotiations with Switzerland was discussed. This will now be prepared for formal adoption by the Council in April at the latest, and if possible before.

The Commission said that it would await the new Parliament before bringing forward a longer term legislative programme associated with the Transport White Paper, on which the Council agreed conclusions in June. The Commission also reported that proposals on the licensing of railway undertakings and access to railway infrastructure were nearing completion. The Council discussed transport and disabled people, transport intermediaries and inland waterways. The Commission agreed to a request by a number of member states, including the United Kingdom, to report on the transport of live animals. The Council was informed that Germany, Denmark and the Benelux countries had completed their work on a regional user charge to be imposed on lorries.

The transport ministers of six central and eastern European countries joined the Council for a meeting over lunch.

Only one formal vote was taken, on the adoption of a Community road safety database. As noted above, the United Kingdom abstained.

Buses (Disabled Access)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of new buses brought into service have access for disabled people.

Mr. Freeman: Over 90 per cent. of all new buses bought in the United Kingdom are now complying completely, or in part, with the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee specification to help large numbers of elderly and ambulant disabled people travel by bus. This specification, which covers a wide range of simple low-cost measures including lower steps, better handrails and the use of colour contrasts, is being revised and tightened up and will be reissued shortly.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now make it his policy to ensure that all new buses brought into service have access for disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I have no plans for this at the present time. We are, however, working closely with the European Commission on a draft construction directive for buses, which may provide for future generations of new buses to be more accessible. In the meantime, we are funding a low floor bus demonstration project in North Tyneside to encourage greater use of such vehicles. This is being monitored and the results will be made available to all operators. A similar trial involving 68 buses is being undertaken in London.

Charter for Bus Services

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for a charter for bus services; what standards he considers should appertain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: We are beginning to consider with London Transport the quality-of-service objectives to apply to its bus services from April 1994. The standards embodied by those objectives will be a key element of the charter for bus passengers in London, which it is planned to publish next spring.

Train Doors (Safety)

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when British Rail last undertook a comprehensive check of door locks on trains; how many were found to be defective; how much it has cost to rectify; how many are all now certified as safe; and how many incidents there have been of doors swinging open unexpectedly in the last 10 years.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail undertakes comprehensive checks of coach door locks in a continuous cycle of maintenance and repair. If a lock is found to be defective, immediate action is taken to rectify it. Information relating to the number and cost of defective locks identified through the maintenance procedure is not collected centrally by BR. The average number of locks changed annually during normal maintenance is approximately 2,300 at an average cost, with labour, of £200 per lock.

There is no record of the number of incidents of doors opening unexpectedly during the last 10 years. The Health and Safety Executive's annual "Report on Railway Safety" shows how often people fall out of trains, how many doors were found irregularly open and how many collisions there have been with open doors on adjacent tracks. Further information is contained in the report on an investigation by the HSE, "Passenger Falls from Train Doors". Copies of both reports are in the House Library.

London Buses

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will explain the basis on which the sum to be made available to London Transport out of the anticipated receipts from the sale of the London Buses Subsidiary Companies was derived.

Mr. Norris: Our advisers have made an estimate of the London Buses Ltd. privatisation proceeds which has been taken into account in the calculation of London Transport's grant settlement. For the present, that estimate must remain commercially confidential.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the Channel Tunnel Safety Authority to publish its fifth annual report.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that the Channel Tunnel Safety Authority published its fifth annual report today. I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 348, if the total number of files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" include those held by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency and the Driver, Vehicle and Operators and Information Technology agency; and how many such files are held by agencies accountable to his Department.

Mr. Norris: Yes. Seventy of the total are held by the Department's six executive agencies.

Non-departmental Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state, for each of the executive non-departmental bodies sponsored by his Department, whether the public has a statutory right to attend all board or committee meetings and to inspect (a) the minutes of meetings, (b) the annual reports and (c) the annual accounts.

Mr. Norris: There is no statutory right for the public to attend board or committee meetings of the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by the Department or to inspect minutes of meetings. The Traffic Director for London is required by statute to submit an annual report and statement of accounts, a copy of which my right hon. Friend is required to lay before each House of Parliament. Copies are available on request from the Traffic Director. My right hon. Friend is responsible for producing the general lighthouse fund accounts. The fund's accounts consolidate the accounts of the three general lighthouse authorities; the Corporation of Trinity House, the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses and the Commissioners of Irish Lights. These accounts are laid before Parliament and are published by HMSO.

Fishing Industry

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) fatalities and (b) injuries were suffered in the fishing industry in 1987, 1990, 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Norris [holding answer 3 December 1993]: For United Kingdom fishing vessels the figures are:

	Number of deaths	Number of reported injuries
1987	16	94
1990	30	98
1991	32	133
1992	16	117

For United Kingdom fish farms the figures relate to the fiscal year and are:

	Number of deaths	Number of reported injuries
1987-88	Nil	5
1990-91	2	32
1991-92	2	21

A2

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) on what date emergency telephones will be installed from Swanscombe to the Danson interchange on the A2; how many there will be; and at what distance apart;

(2) what consultations he plans with local authorities on the exact positions of emergency telephones along the A2 between Swanscombe and the Danson interchange.

Mr. Key: Tenders for the installation of emergency telephones on the A2 in Kent, from the M2—Three Crutches—westwards to the county boundary, were invited on 24 November. It is hoped to be able to start the work in mid-January, but full commissioning will not be possible until about a year later. The contract will provide for 14 telephones alongside each of the carriageways, 28 in total, spaced approximately one mile—1·6 km—apart.

In line with usual practice, local authorities are not being consulted on the positioning of the telephones, which is determined by the Department's spacing specification and roadside conditions.

We have no present plans to install emergency telephones along the length of the A2 within the London borough of Bexley between the county boundary and the Danson interchange.

PRIME MINISTER

Information Systems

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Prime Minister in how many Departments the management information systems for Ministers—MINIS—has been in force since November 1990 and over what periods; and what were the setting up times and costs in each case.

The Prime Minister: The Department of the Environment adopted MINIS—the management information systems for Ministers—in 1979. The Department of Trade and Industry introduced MINIS in June 1992. MINIS was described as a good example for Departments to look at when the financial management initiative was launched in 1982 and elements have subsequently been incorporated into other Departments' top management systems. Estimates of the costs of running and developing individual departmental top management systems since November 1990 are not available.

Security Services

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what is the delineation of the responsibility of each security service organisation for counter-proliferation; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Countering the threat from proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is a high priority task for the Secret Intelligence Service, Government Communications Headquarters and the Security Service and the resources of the agencies devoted to that task have been increased. I do not propose to go into any further detail about their work.

Official Residences

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 30 November, if he will list the functions held at (a) No. 10 Downing street and (b) Chequers since November 1990, where the cost of refreshments was paid for by a political party; how many guests attended; how much expenditure was reimbursed in each case; and what charge was made for the hire of facilities.

The Prime Minister: Thirty-nine occasions have been held at 10 Downing street or Chequers where the cost of refreshments was paid for by the Conservative party. As under previous Administrations, no charge was made for the hire of facilities. Expenditure is billed directly to the organisation concerned and no central records kept.

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 325, regarding fuel costs of official residences, if he will provide the names of the chairs of trustees for (a) Chequers, (b) Dorneywood and (c) Chevening.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 2 December]: The Lord Privy Seal is the chairman of the board of trustees of both Chequers and Chevening. In the case of Dorneywood, the chairman is elected on an "ad hoc" basis at every meeting. The Lord Privy Seal is a member of the board of trustees and, in practice, it is customary for him to chair meetings if he is present.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

The Prime Minister: The Prime Minister's records are reviewed for any continuing sensitivy 29 years after their creation. Approximately 42 linear feet of records are reviewed each year, by a part-time member of my staff, in accordance with the guidelines contained in chapter 9 of the "Open Government" White Paper—Cm 2290. About 4 per cent. of the records reviewed are retained and these are subject to regular re-review.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to discuss Irish responses to the consultation on THORP at his next meeting with his Irish counterpart.

The Prime Minister: No.

Special Advisers

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what procedures are in place to ensure that special advisers attached to Ministers have no pecuniary or other interests that may conflict with their duties;

(2) if he will list the ways in which the rules applying to (a) the acceptance of outside appointments after resignation or retirement and (b) political activities by special advisers attached to Ministers differ from those applying to other civil servants.

The Prime Minister: Special advisers are subject to the same rules on conflict of interest as other civil servants. If a conflict arises in relation to their duties they must declare the interest. The business appointment rules on the acceptance of appointments after resignation or retirement do not apply to special advisers. Arrangements are made to ensure they do not have access to the kind of information, and they are not involved in the type of business, that would be likely to create suspicion of impropriety in relation to subsequent employment. Advisers are allowed more freedom of political activity than other civil servants to the extent that, with the approval of their Minister, they may attend party functions, including the party conference as an observer, may maintain contacts with party members and may take part in policy reviews conducted by the party.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total amount paid in salaries to special advisers attached to Ministers in each year since 1988 in (a) cash and (b) current prices.

As at	Paybill[1] £ million	1993-94 prices[2] £ million
June 1993	1·37	1·37
September 1992	1·3	1·34

September 1988	0·74	0·97

[1] Not including earnings-related national insurance contribution and other personnel overheads.

[2] Calculated using the GDP deflator.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list (a) the annual salaries paid to special advisers attached to Ministers in bands of £10,000 and (b) the number of advisers whose salary falls within each band.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is as follows:

Salary band £	Number of special advisers[1]
0— 10,000	2
10— 20,000	1
20— 30,000	10

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of people employed, (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

The Prime Minister: For recruitment purposes, my Office is part of the Cabinet Office. The figures for that Department, excluding its executive agencies and the CCTA—Government Centre for Information Systems—are set out. Ethnic monitoring in the civil service is carried out on a voluntary basis. Figures for Asian and black staff therefore only include those who have chosen so to describe themselves.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Prime Minister how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes."

The Prime Minister: No files marked "Not for NAO eyes" are held by my Department. There is no such classification as "Not for PAC eyes".

Mr. Byers: To ask the Prime Minister how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 3 December 1993]: None.

Year of the Family

Miss Lestor: To ask the Prime Minister what action is proposed by Her Majesty's Government to celebrate the UN Year of the Family 1994; and which Minister is responsible for its co-ordination and implementation.

The Prime Minister: Family policy bears on the responsibilities of a number of Government Departments, who in 1994 and beyond will be taking appropriate steps within their remits to strengthen our commitment to the family. We also support the United Kingdom Association for the International Year of the Family, which will be organising and overseeing activities within the United Kingdom during the year.

During the International Year of the Family, domestic and international issues touching on the family will continue to be led and co-ordinated in the usual way, depending on the key departmental interest. However, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will act as a liaison point for the co-ordination and exchange of information about and during the year.

Redundancies and Closures

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will list all hon. Members whom he has personally met concerning redundancies or closures in their constituencies, the dates of each of the meetings and the precise nature and numbers of redundancies involved;

(2) what is his policy concerning meetings with hon. Members about redundancies or closures in their constituencies;

(3) if he will now meet the Ayrshire hon. Members to discuss redundancies at Jetstream and the long-term threat to the plant.

The Prime Minister: I understand that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry met a group of hon. Members to discuss Jetstream on 25 November.

Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry and I often discuss such matters with right hon. and hon. Members.

Ex-service Men

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has received calling for the setting up of a department of veterans' affairs to cover the needs of ex-service men; what consideration he is giving to dealing with such requests positively; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 2 December]: I have received a number of letters from right hon. and hon. Members and members of the public on this matter, but I do not believe that the establishment of a separate department for ex-service affairs would result in a better service for ex-service men and women. The facilities of the health service and social security system are available to all and provision for veterans is integrated with that for the population as a whole; a new department would simply add another tier of administration.

We recognise, however, that some ex-service personnel may encounter difficulties on returning to civilian life. We are therefore committed to the provision of comprehensive resettlement advice and support. We also recognise the particular needs of disabled ex-service personnel; we have not only preserved the preferential provisions of the war pensions scheme, but have also done much to enhance it.

Royal Marsden Hospital

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister when he received the petition opposing the closure of the Royal Marsden hospital and its institute of cancer research; and what response he has made.

The Prime Minister: The petition was received in my office on Thursday 25 November and has been passed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health for consideration.

EDUCATION

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many pupils have attended Wolverhampton grammar school under the assisted places scheme since the scheme's inception; what was the cost to the state of those places; and if he will give the usual place of residence of pupils attending the school under the APS listed by parliamentary constituency and local government ward.

Mr. Forth: Nearly 460 pupils have benefited from assisted places at Wolverhampton grammar school since the scheme was established in 1981. In 1992-93 there were 256 assisted pupils and the cost to public funds was £760,000. Schools participating in the scheme are not required to supply data concerning pupils' residence and the Department does not hold any such information centrally.

Classroom Discipline

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps he will take to encourage schools to insist the pupils treat the teaching staff with respect and call them by their surnames.

Mr. Forth: Head teachers are responsible for maintaining discipline within their schools and for encouraging pupils to have respect for others. How best to achieve that is a matter for local determination.

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to offer guidelines on classroom discipline.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend plans to issue a circular of guidance on behaviour and discipline in spring 1994. We will be consulting widely on the terms of that guidance.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Boswell: The Department does not have a sensitive documents unit.

Children (School Hours)

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment he has made of the extent of variations of hours children spend in schools; whether there are regional differences or differences for grant-maintained schools; and what analysis has been carried out of the correlation with performance.

Mr. Robin Squire: Provisional data for January 1993 for maintained schools in England show that, in primary education, 3 per cent. of pupils are receiving less than 21 hours' teaching a week whereas at the other end of the range 4 per cent. are receiving 26 hours or more. In secondary education, 2 per cent. of pupils are receiving less than 23 hours a week compared to 26 hours or more received by the 5 per cent. at the other end of the range. On average, pupils in primary education received 23·2 hours per week compared with 24·3 hours per week for pupils in secondary education. These figures refer to time during which children are actually being taught rather than time spent on school premises.

There appear to be no significant differences between local education authorities maintained and self-governing—GM—schools. There is some variation between regions: between an average of 22·9 hours per week in East Anglia and 23·5 hours per week in the north in primary education, and between an average of 24·1 hours per week in Yorkshire and Humberside and 24·5 hours per week in East Anglia and the south-west in secondary education.

Initial work carried out in the Department indicates on average a small but statistically significant positive correlation between the length of the taught week and educational performance as measured by public examinations and national tests.

Student Unions

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many representations he has received on making membership of student unions voluntary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boswell: Since the Government's plans for the reform of student unions were announced on 1 July, my right hon. Friend has received some 3,000 representations about the voluntary principle for student unions which our proposed reforms are intended to implement.

EC Students

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what are the costs of education in England and Wales for EC students met by (a) his Department and (b) each local education authority; and what are the numbers of such students from each EC country, and in each level of institute of education.

Mr. Boswell: Students from other EC member states attending designated courses of higher education in the United Kingdom qualify for an award covering their course fees up to a specified maximum, where they satisfy basic eligibility conditions similar to those for students who live in the United Kingdom. In 1991-92 there were some 11,100 such award holders studying in England and Wales. In that year, mandatory awards expenditure by local authorities in England and Wales on students from other EC member states totalled £22·8 million; local authorities are fully reimbursed for this expenditure by the Department. In the same year, additional expenditure by the Department on awards to students from other EC member states attending part of a higher education course at an institution in England and Wales totalled £1·5 million. Copies of Department for Education statistical bulletins 21/93 and 22/93, which give details of students from abroad and student awards in England and Wales, are available in the Library.

Other provision for students from other EC member states studying in England and Wales, which flows from the grant made annually to institutions by the higher education funding councils, is in the region of £80 million. Reciprocal rights apply to British nationals studying elsewhere in the EC.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Forth: The Department has 39 files—out of a total of over 500,000—marked "Not for NAO eyes".

This marking is used in accordance with the agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office under which documents relating to the handling of relations between departments and the NAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they remain current.

There is no such marking as "Not for PAC eyes".

Opt-out Ballots

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what representations he has received from the Electoral Reform Society regarding documents published by his Department and sent out with opt-out ballot papers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Electoral Reform Society's company, Electoral Reform (Ballot Services) Ltd., wrote to the Department on 1 December about a leaflet sent to parents with their ballot papers. A reply will be sent shortly.

Sixth Forms

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what action he intends to take following his statement at the annual conference of the Girls Schools Association on 25 November about the role of school sixth forms.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend intends shortly to publish, following consultation with the Further Education Funding Council and others, a framework of criteria in the light of which he will make future decisions on statutory proposals for new school sixth forms.

University Grants Committee

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the total gross public spending for each year from 1983-84 to 1988-89, in 1992-93 prices, for the University Grants Committee.

Mr. Boswell: Figures for total capital and recurrent grant are shown below:

1984-85	2,119
1985-86	2,068
1986-87	2,080
1987-88	2,175
1988-89	2,203

The figures do not include publicly funded tuition fees.

Grant-maintained Schools

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been, in 1992-93 prices, the total gross public spending for each year from 1991-92, and the projected expenditure for each year up to 1995-96 for grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Robin Squire: Total spending to date on self-governing—grant-maintained—schools has been as follows:

Exchequer grant	22	50
Annual maintenance grant	167	435

The Government's spending plans for 1993-94 to 1995-96, at 1992-1993 prices, provide for total Exchequer grant as follows:

1993-94 £ million	1994-95 £ million	1995-96 £ million
150	226	398

Provisional outturn spending on annual maintenance grant for 1993-94, at 1992-93 prices, is £950 million. Depending on the number and size of grant-maintained schools, total annual maintenance grant for 1994-95 and 1995-96 is projected to be around:

1994-95 £ billion	1995-96 £ billionl

Note: Figures for exchequer grant include special purpose grants; capital grant; cost of GM ballots; the Grant Maintained Schools Centre; and the projected cost of the Funding Agency for Schools. They exclude other spending by local authorities, who remain responsible for some services to GM pupils, and DFE running costs.

City Technology Colleges

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been, in 1992-93 prices, the total gross public spending for each year from 1987-88, and the projected expenditure for each year to 1995-96 for city technology colleges.

Mr. Robin Squire: Total spending on city technology colleges by the Department since 1987-88 and projected expenditure to 1995-96 are shown in the following table. This includes both capital and recurrent expenditure.

DFE Expenditure

Financial Year	At 1992-93 prices £ million	Cash £ million
1987-88	2	1
1988-89	18	14
1989-90	36	30
1990-91	64	58
1991-92	58	56
1992-93	50	50
1993-94 (estimated outturn)	48	50
1994-95 (plans)	48	52
1995-96 (plans)	51	56

Funding Councils

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the total gross public spending for each year from 1989-90, in 1992-93 prices, for (a) the Universities Funding Council and (b) the Polytechnic and Colleges Funding Council.

Mr. Boswell: Figures for total capital and recurrent grant to the funding councils are shown:

CAMBRIDGESHIRE

	UFC	PCFC
1989-90	2,209	1,324
1990-91	2,027	1,215
1992-93	1,804	1,036

The decline in grant from 1990-91 onwards relates to the transfer of funds to tuition fees reimbursed through mandatory awards. Recurrent funding for higher education taking account of tuition fees increased by more than 10 per cent. in real terms over the period.

Student Loan Scheme

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will publish a table showing the number of those in arrears on repayment of the student loan scheme by (a) educational institution and (b) county/borough of residence.

Mr. Boswell: This is a matter for the Student Loans Company. I will ask the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what procedures are in force for his Department to be notified of any approach to British Nuclear Fuels plc from any utility with a contract with British Nuclear Fuels plc for the use of THORP, to cancel or vary the contract or its terms.

Mr. Eggar: My Department is in regular contact with British Nuclear Fuels plc on a wide range of issues.

Leases

Mr. Spellar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will introduce legislation as part of his deregulative initiatives to make illegal anti-competitive abuses in commercial leases which allow only upward review of rents.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The measure described does not appear to be deregulatory and does not fall within the scope of the deregulation initiative. The Department of the Environment has, however, issued a consultation paper on certain aspects of commercial property leasing arrangements, including upward-only rent reviews. An announcement of the outcome of that exercise will be made in due course.

Monopolies and Mergers Commission

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade who appoints the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; who are the present members; what are their qualifications by examinations; what posts they currently hold; and when they were appointed.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Biographical details of members of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission are compiled by the commission for publication in its annual review. I will write to the hon. Gentleman enclosing those biographical details, and relevant dates of appointment. Qualifications by examinations are not a factor in determining the suitability of potential MMC members and, as such, details of the current members' qualifications are not held. Collation of such details could be made only at disproportionate cost.

Car Parking

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to establish an advisory panel to advise him on restrictive practices and monopolistic power in the provision of car parking in Britain.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I announced to the House on 14 April, Official Report, column 842-50, that when parliamentary time permits, proposals will be introduced to strengthen existing United Kingdom legislation concerning anti-competitive and exploitative behaviour following the Green Paper on abuse of market power. At the same time, a prohibition on restrictive trade practices will be introduced. As part of this package, the Fair Trading Act 1973 and the Competition Act 1980 will be extended to cover some limited situations where specific property rights are exercised in a way which damages competition. I am currently considering the property rights to which competition law should apply and the extension of the Fair Trading Act 1973 to temporary rights of access such as car parks is one option under consideration.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Eggar: My Department's sensitive documents unit arranges for the circulation of such documents to those officials cleared to see them. Its procedures are kept under review and amended from time to time. Two officials are employed in the unit full time and one half time. At present, it handles some 9,000 documents a year.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many nuclear reactors in the United Kingdom have parts which contain the nickel-based alloy, Inconel 600; what assessment his Department has made as to its safety; what representations he has received; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I understand that Inconel 600 is used chiefly in Sizewell B, but the material is also found in minor components in certain other nuclear stations. Any implications for such plant arising from the use of a material are taken into account by the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate—NII. The performance of materials—such as Inconel 600—is an integral part of the safety case assessment which is carried out before reactors are started up and which continues throughout their operation. Such safety cases are reviewed periodically and amended as necessary in light of new information. For its part, Nuclear Electric is undertaking a programme of inspections at Sizewell B which will ensure early warning of any problems arising from the use of Inconel 600 and enable remedial action to be promptly implemented. Moreover, the NII would not allow any nuclear power station to commence or continue in operation if they were not satisfied that it was safe to do so. I have received two letters from hon. Members forwarding representations from their constituents about this matter.

Budget Setting

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give the date on which the budgets for each of his Department's laboratories and agencies were finalised for 1993-94.

Mr. Heseltine: Budgets for 1993-94 were set on 5 January 1993 for the following:
Accounts Services Agency
Radiocommunications Agency
Laboratory of the Government Chemist
National Physical Laboratory
National Engineering Laboratory
Warren Spring Laboratory
Patent Office
Companies House
and on 1 April 1993 for the following:
National Weights and Measures Laboratory
Insolvency Service

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what was the mass of spent fuel discharged from each Magnox reactor operated by Nuclear Electric in each financial year since 1983-84;

(2) what commitment has been given by Nuclear Electric in relation to the reprocessing of spent fuel from pressurised water reactors.

Mr. Eggar: These are operational matters for Nuclear Electric plc.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what facilities exist in the United Kingdom for the conversion of plutonimum into californium.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Japan (Atomic Energy Agreement)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when Her Majesty's Government last sought assurance from the Japanese Government in regard to the commitments entered into under article III(a) of the United Kingdom/Japan agreement for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy (Cm 3853).

Mr. Eggar: Her Majesty's Government last sought assurance from the Japanese Government in July 1992.

Nuclear Safeguards

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions since 1990 Her Majesty's Government have informed the appropriate safeguards authorities of its putting into effect clause 14 of the United Kingdom-EURATOM-International Atomic Agency trilateral safeguards agreement.

Mr. Eggar: In accordance with the arrangements under article 14 of the United Kingdom-Euratom-IAEA tripartite safeguards agreement, 46 advanced notifications of withdrawal of nuclear material from safeguards have been made since 1 January 1990.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the latest undiscounted cost estimate for the dumping of projected United Kingdom low level and intermediate level radioactive waste arising in the Nirex repository; the unit cost for the dumping of that waste; and the latest date for fully opening the repository for low level and intermediate level radioactive waste.

Mr. Eggar: These are management matters for UK Nirex Ltd.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes."

Mr. Eggar: No central record is kept by my Department of files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes". For each National Audit Office study, a number of divisions in different locations may be involved and each may possess in its registries a file with a number of parts —that is, individual jackets. The information requested is therefore not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The marking "not for National Audit Office eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the National Audit Office and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the National Audit Office while they are current.

There is no marking "not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Eco-labelling

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the letter sent to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Technology on 20 October by the Body Shop in connection with EC eco-labelling and animal welfare; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: I have been asked to reply.

My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in another place has replied to the letter from the Body Shop. Copies of her reply of 2 December have been placed in the Library of the House.

Fireworks

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of fireworks sold in Britain was manufactured in Britain in each year since 1980.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have been asked to reply

The information requested is not available.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. John M. Taylor: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. John M. Taylor: There are 45 files in the Lord Chancellor's Department—out of a total of 90,974—marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes". These refer to individual file parts. For each National Audit Office study, a number of divisions may be involved and each may possess a file with a number of parts.

The marking "Not for National Audit Office eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the National Audit Office and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the National Audit Office while they are current.

There is no marking "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Divorce Law

Mr. Milligan: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans Her Majesty's Government have to bring forward reform to the law of divorce in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor has today laid before Parliament a consultation document, "Looking to the Future: Mediation and the Ground for Divorce", which canvasses a number of options for divorce law reform and the greater use of family mediation. The Lord Chancellor hopes that the document will stimulate a wide-ranging and informed debate about this important subject.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Security Services

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to seek power to issue a post-hoc warrant to cover any interference with property or wireless telegraph by a member or members of the security services.

Mr. Hurd: None.

International Organisations

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total cost of United Kingdom subscriptions to international organisations in each of the last five years at constant prices.

Mr. Goodlad: The total cost to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—including the Overseas Development Administration—of United Kingdom subscriptions to international organisations at 1992-93 prices was:

1988-89	830
1989-90	791
1990-91	758
1991-92	993
1992-93	1,035

Intelligence and Security Committee

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration was given to including a Member of the European Parliament on the intelligence and security committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The Intelligence Services Bill provides for the members of the intelligence and security committee to be appointed by the Prime Minister after consultation with the Leader of the Opposition. Each Committee member shall be a member of either the House of Commons or the House of Lords, and none shall be a Minister of the Crown. There are no other restrictions on who the Prime Minister may appoint.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what matters, in regard to the implications for the environment, he intends to raise at the meeting of the European Union Foreign Affairs Council special meeting on the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The special Foreign Affairs Council on 2 December did not discuss the implications for the environment of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The existing GATT system allows for trade-restrictive measures to protect the environment, under certain conditions. The proposed Uruguay round agreement would strengthen the ability of the international trading system to respond to environmental concerns.

Turkey

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government will take on the eviction by the Turkish security forces of the villagers of Hassana in south-eastern Turkey; and if he will take steps to encourage the Turkish authorities to ensure that the villagers have sufficient food, clothing, warmth and shelter.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have made clear to the Turkish Government our concern about the conflict in south-east Turkey, and will continue to do so. It is appalling that innocent civilians should be caught up in the violence, and vital that human rights should be properly respected.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Foreign and Commonwealth Office records are reviewed for any continuing sensitivity 29 or 30 years after their creation, by a team of up to nine part-time senior retired members of the diplomatic service, supervised and supported by seven permanent officials in the library and records department. Approximately 650 ft of records have been reviewed this year, in accordance with the guidelines contained in chapter 9 of the "Open Government" White paper—Cm. 2290—of July 1993.

United Kingdom Overseas Visitors (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has received (a) directly and (b) via consulates from United Kingdom citizens in respect of requests for financial assistance to help them get out of immediate difficulties abroad.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There are strict criteria which have to be met before financial assistance from the public purse can be authorised. The post must be satisfied that the applicant is destitute, has no funds in the United Kingdom, that his predicament is not of his own making, and that he cannot make use of a cheque card and cannot arrange for the rapid transfer of funds through commercial channels from relatives or friends. We occasionally receive representations, either directly or referred by Members of Parliament, from the public on posts abroad who have refused them financial assistance.

United Nations Committee (Administrative and Budgetary Questions)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the vote on 15 November to re-elect the United Nations advisory committee on administrative and budgetary questions; and how the decision will affect the United Kingdom.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom expert on the committee failed to gain re-election at the vote in the UN in New York on 15 November. The three candidates contesting the two vacant seats, received the following votes: Ms Eriksson Fogh—Sweden—132, Ms Shenwick—United States of America—102, Mr. Stitt—United Kingdom—91.

The result was a disappointment. But the United Kingdom expert remains in New York dealing with UN financial questions and is our representative on the fifth committee of the General Assembly. It is the fifth committee that has the authority to take decisions on UN financial issues and is the body to which ACABQ reports.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Goodlad: The information requested is not readily available. To provide it would require consultations with all overseas posts. This could only be done at disproportionate cost. The marking "Not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office's internal audit unit regularly checks to ensure that the marking is not abused.

There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

World Summit on Children

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to publish the Government's action statement arising from the World Summit on Children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom published in July 1992 Command Paper No. 1984 entitled "Report on the United Kingdom Implementation of the Goals agreed by the World Summit on Children". A copy was placed in the Library of the House.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Newton: The Privy Council Office meets the cost of a car and driver for each of its two Ministers. The total cost in 1992-93 was £132,692.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Newton: The Privy Council Office holds no files with such markings.

WALES

Welsh Energy Project

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what recent discussions he has had with the chairman and energy experts at the Welsh Development Agency on the Welsh energy project;

(2) if he will make a statement on the information gathered, conclusions reached and policy proposals developed by the Welsh energy project.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE

Mr. Redwood: I have had no discussions with the Welsh Development Agency about the Welsh energy project. This is an operational matter and I have therefore asked the chief executive of the agency to write to the hon. Gentleman and for a copy of his response to be placed in the Library of the House.

A470

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to prioritise the road improvement scheme to the A470 Blaenau Ffestiniog to Betws-y-Coed road; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend is considering the scope to bring forward some of the more important schemes in the forward road programme. The draft orders for the first stage of the Lledr Valley improvement, between Cancoed and Minffordd, were published on 30 November.

Schools

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much capital grant funding has been allocated to the schools in Wales which have decided to opt out; how much this is per school; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There are two types of capital grant available to grant-maintained schools: a formula allocation for the purchase of equipment or small-scale capital works; and project allocations for specific capital work.

In 1993-94 11 grant-maintained schools have received £211,346 under the formula allocation, giving an average per school of £19,213. As regards specific project allocations, seven schools have had projects approved in principle and have been invited to submit firm estimates and tenders. The total outline estimate costs of the projects which have been approved in principle come to some £5·434 million.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many schools to date have opted out; and if he will make a statement on the progress of the opt-out scheme for schools in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: At 1 September this year there were 11 grant-maintained schools. A further three schools have been approved to become grant-maintained from 1 January 1994. Applications from a further two schools are currently under consideration and a number of other schools are in the process of balloting parents.

Aberconwy

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the efforts the Welsh Office has made to secure, via the Department of Trade and Industry, objective 5(b) status for the Aberconwy borough.

Mr. Redwood: Aberconwy is on the list of eligible objective 5(b) areas submitted by the Government to the European Commission which will make known its decisions in due course.

Forest Enterprise

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received on public access rights and the privatisation of Forest Enterprise; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend and I have received 55 representations on these matters since the Forestry Review Group was established on 30 March 1993.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Ainger: To [illegible] the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the total expenditure by the Welsh Development Agency on rural areas and initiatives in 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93; and what is the projected expenditure in 1993-94;

(2) what are the total receipts to date of sales of Welsh Development Agency property in the current financial year;

(3) what proportion of the Welsh Development Agency's budget was allocated to rural areas and initiatives in 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93; and what is the projected proportion in 1993-94;

(4) which properties owned by the Welsh Development Agency have been sold in the current financial year; and which other properties are on the market;

(5) how many members of staff of the Welsh Development Agency are employed on implementing the agency's rural policies;

(6) what was the total annual rents charged on those properties sold by the Welsh Development Agency in the current year.

Mr. Redwood: I have arranged for the chief executive of the agency to write to the hon. Gentleman and for a copy of his response to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from individuals and organisations in Wales on the rural policy of the Welsh Development Agency in the current financial year.

Mr. Redwood: None.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the geographic boundaries of the Development Board for Rural Wales and the Welsh Development Agency were last reviewed.

Mr. Redwood: The position was reviewed at the time of the 1991 financial, management and policy review of the board.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which geographical areas in Wales are covered by the rural division of the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Redwood: The agency is responsible for all rural areas in Wales except for the county of Powys and the districts of Ceredigion in Dyfed and Meirionnydd in Gwynedd.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when his Department last carried out a review of the rural policies of the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Redwood: The rural policies of the agency are a matter for the agency. They are kept under continual review.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultation his Department has had with local authorities, employer representative organisations and the Welsh Trades Union Congress over the future role of rural policy within the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Redwood: None. [illegible] agency's programmes for rural areas are compatible with overall rural policy in Wales. In drawing up its programmes, the agency consults widely.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much, in cash and percentage terms, of the Welsh Development Agency's total income was derived from (a) grant in aid, (b) capital receipts and (c) current income in 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94; and what are the projected figures for 1994-95.

Mr. Redwood: The figures are as follows:

(a) Grant in aid
Cash (£ million)	87·067	74·866	59·550
Per cent.	54·0	44·9	34·7
(b) Capital receipts
Cash (£ million)	38·280	59·050	83·900
Per cent.	23·7	35·4	48·9
(c) Current income
Cash (£ million)	31·406	31·999	25·950
Per cent.	19·4	19·2	15·1

I will shortly be announcing the agency's budget for 1994-95.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Redwood: There are 97 files in my Department marked "Not for NAO eyes". These figures refer to individual jackets—file parts. For each NAO study a number of divisions may be involved and each may possess a file with a number of parts.

The marking "Not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

Berse Horticultural Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of the Berse horticultural scheme, Wrexham.

Mr. Redwood: The future of the scheme is a matter for NACRO—New Careers Training—and North East Wales TEC.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many times departmental ministers and officials have visited the Berse horticultural scheme.

Mr. Redwood: There have been no visits by Welsh Office Ministers or officials to this scheme.

Less-favoured Areas

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact of the Budget Statement upon prospects for 1994 in the less-favoured areas of Wales.

Mr. Redwood: I announced last week that direct Government support during 1994-95 for agriculture in Wales will be £233·9 million. This means an extra £18·6 million, 8·6 per cent., for Welsh agriculture, compared to planned provision for the current financial year. Despite the need to keep a firm control on public spending, this demonstrates the Government's continuing commitment to the agriculture industry in Wales. The agriculture industry in Wales is currently in a much healthier state, helped in part by much lower interest rates and very low inflation. These factors benefit hill farmers as much as other parts of the economy.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the grant-maintained schools and those schools seeking grant-maintained status in each of the less-favoured areas of Wales, giving the amount of extra cash grants for each of the grant-maintained schools; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The only formal designation of less-favoured areas is under European Community directives concerned with farming. There is no connection with education expenditure. However, in such areas in Wales there are six grant-maintained schools. They are:

Cwmcarn Comprehensive, Gwent
Bishop Vaughan Catholic Comprehensive, West Glamorgan
Brynmawr Comprehensive, Gwent
Caergeiliog Primary, Gwynedd
Llanerfyl Church in Wales Primary, Powys; and Ysgol Derwen, Clwyd

In addition, St. Albans comprehensive in Pontypool, Gwent which has been approved for grant-maintained status from 1 January 1994, lies in a less-favoured area.

The funding of grant-maintained schools reflects the level of resources that a school would have received had it remained with its former local education authority. All grant-maintained schools, irrespective of whether they are in a less-favoured area, are eligible for transitional grants, special purpose grants, and capital grants over and above their annual maintenance grant.

School Pupils

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will introduce modular approach testing in future examinations for GCSE pupils.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have no immediate plans to do so. Fair markings of GCSE grades are best maintained by a terminal examination and adherence to the specified limits on GCSE coursework.

Cockle Dredging

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of fishing vessels that have been granted an authorisation covering the October to December period to suction-dredge for cockles in (a) the North Wales and North West England Sea Fisheries Committee area and (b) elsewhere in Wales, if he will specify the catch limits and other harvesting conditions imposed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Such matters are the responsibility of sea fisheries committees. I understand that the North Western and North Wales Sea Fisheries Committee has issued 10 authorisations to suction dredge for cockles on Lavan sands for a limited period and that these are the only authorisations which have been issued in Wales.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had and what representations he has received in relation to the issuing of authorisations for cockle fishing by suction dredging in Traeth Lafan in Conwy bay.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I have received one letter from the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to use his powers under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to issue an order banning the suction dredging of cockles in the Traeth Lafan area of the Conwy bay site of special scientific interest and special protection area.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None.

Non-departmental Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will show for each of the executive non-departmental bodies sponsored by his Department, whether the public has a statutory right to attend all board or committee meetings and to inspect (a) the minutes of meetings, (b) the annual reports and (c) the annual accounts.

Mr. Redwood: There is no statutory right for the public to attend meetings, or to see minutes of meetings, for any of these bodies. The ordinances of the National Library provide for every meeting of the court of the Library to be public, unless a resolution to the contrary is carried by the members present, in respect of the full meeting or of specific items or portions of the business.

The annual reports and accounts of the following executive non-departmental bodies are in the Library of the House and are publicly available.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation
Countryside Council for Wales
Curriculum Council for Wales
Development Board for Rural Wales
Further Education Funding Council
Higher Education Funding Council

Welsh Development Agency

The Wales Youth Agency is a company limited by guarantee and its annual report and accounts for 1992-93 are deposited at Companies House, Cardiff; from 1993-94 its report and accounts will be placed in the Library of the House. The Royal Commission for Ancient and Historical Monuments is funded directly from the Welsh Office vote and its expenditure is accounted for in the annual Welsh Office appropriation accounts.

Housing

Dr. Wright: To [illegible] the Secretary of State for Wales what has been, in 1992-93 prices, the gross public investment in Wales in the provision of housing, both new build and renovated, by (a) local authorities and (b) housing associations for each year since 1979-80; and what is the projected investment for both categories up to 1995-96.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I will write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as this information is available, and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

EMPLOYMENT

Career Development Scheme

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many applications for loans under the career development scheme have been made in 1993-94 for each region and for Great Britain as a whole; how many have been rejected; how many women have been awarded loans; how many training for work-employment training participants have been awarded loans endorsed by their training and enterprise council or local enterprise company; what have been the successful course completion rates in each region; how much has been awarded in total for each region; how much has been recovered; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Information by region on the number of loans approved under the career development loan scheme, numbers of applications rejected, number of loans approved for women, value of loans approved and the successful course completion rate are shown in the tables. The information given is for the period April 1993 to the end of October 1993.

Details of the number of training for work and employment training participants and of the amount of money repaid are not available.

Further information on career development loans can be found in the 1992-93 annual report, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Training for Work

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will remove the upper age limit for unemployed persons participating in training for work programmes.

Miss Widdecombe: I am pleased to tell the hon. Member that the upper age limit for training for work participants will be raised to 63 years from April 1994.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Miss Widdecombe: The security requirements for information technology—IT—systems and services used by central Government Departments are stated in Her Majesty's Government IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the Central Communications Telecommunications Agency risk analysis and management methods—CRAMM—and the baseline security for IT systems—[illegible]ITS—risk analysis methods, by the Communications Electronic Security Group—CESG—memorandum No. 10 where appropriate, and by supporting advice and guidance published by the HMG IT security authorities.

These are reviewed regularly to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation for some time.

The code of practice for information security management was developed by, and established for use by, commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Miss Widdecombe: We do not have a sensitive file unit.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give figures for the total adult unemployment in Warley, West on 1 January for each of the past five years.

Miss Widdecombe: The number of unemployed claimants aged 18 years and over in the Warley, West constituency from 1989 onwards, in January of each year, was 3,374, 2,484, 2,862, 4,252 and 4,878.

Youth Training Scheme

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many participants of the former youth training scheme found full-time employment as a result of joining the scheme; and what percentage of total entry this represents.

Miss Widdecombe: It is estimated that of all those who left the former youth training scheme in its last full year of operation—April 1989 to March 1990—in Great Britain, 63 per cent. went into full-time employment.

Access to Work

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from individuals and organisations about proposals to change access to work, especially to oblige employers to contribute 50 per cent. of the cost of purchasing services such as personal readers and special aids to employment for people employed for more than six months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: [holding answer 30 November 1993]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my noble Friend Lord Henley have been in correspondence with and met a number of disability and employer organisations about details of access to work, which will help more disabled people, in a broader range of work, to obtain or retain jobs. My right hon. Friend will make an announcement when he has reached decisions on the details of the scheme.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not held centrally and we regret that the information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

There is no marking "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 3 December 1993]: The information is not held centrally and we regret that the information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

DEFENCE

RAF Brawdy

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what financial compensation the RAF is to receive in return for RAF Brawdy being used by the Army from 1994 instead of being available for RAF use or sale.

Mr. Hanley: The Army currently plans to use RAF Brawdy as temporary accommodation until 1996. Should occupation extend beyond this, an appropriate financial transfer will be made to the RAF to offset the land receipts assumed in the Air Force budget.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Hanley: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Plutonium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. [illegible]ghes) of 23 November 1993, Official Report, column 318, if he will set out the basis for his statement that it would take considerable expense and difficulty for plutonium arising from the thermal oxide reprocessing plant to be used in nuclear weapons.

Mr. Aitken: For reasons of national security it would be inappropriate for me to comment further on how to construct a nuclear device, or on the usefulness of various materials in making a nuclear device.

Aldermaston

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies of the geology and hydrogeology of the atomic weapons establishment Aldermaston site have been carried out; and if he will place a copy of the results in the Library.

Mr. Aitken: Studies looking at various aspects of AWE operations are carried out periodically including recent surveys to support studies on water management systems at Aldermaston. Such studies are initiated locally and the reports written for internal management use. It would be inappropriate to place such documents in the Library.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Hanley: The annual total cost of the car service for Defence Department Ministers is some £175,000.

Five vehicles are provided in London, including a reserve vehicle held in readiness for the Secretary of State. An arrangement exists for the use of a car supplied by the Scottish Office when the Secretary of State for Defence is in Scotland and the cost of this is reflected in the sum quoted.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Hanley: The number of personnel and civilians currently employed in complemented PR and PR support posts in London and commands and districts at home and overseas is 175. The comparable figure for 1985-86 is 249·5. A figure for 1979 is not available.

Health and Safety

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all certificates of exemption which he has issued under the provisions of regulation 14 of the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1992.

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has not granted any certificates of exemption under the provisions of regulation 14 of the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1992.

Western European Union

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department was represented at the 39th ordinary session of the Western European Union in Paris from 29 November to 2 December; what proposals were put forward by the United Kingdom; what decisions were taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The last session of the WEU Assembly, which took place in Paris from 29 November to 2 December 1993, was attended by the Deputy United Kingdom Permanent Representative to NATO and other officials of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. There was no MOD representation on this occasion. A number of reports were presented, either singly or jointly, by United Kingdom Parliamentarians, on behalf of several of the Assembly's committees. Copies of those reports can be obtained from the WEU Assembly in Paris. Recommendations embodied in individual reports will be considered by the WEU Council in due course.

International Military Services

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what subcontractors International Military Services Ltd. employed to carry out its functions, and act on its behalf and at which locations;

(2) if he will give the objectives, yearly profits and years of business operation of IMS Iran Ltd.

Mr. Aitken: As International Military Services is a private limited company, the information requested relates to the trading operations of the company, is of a commercially confidential nature and is not the responsibility of my Department. The company publishes its accounts for public scrutiny in accordance with the requirements of company law.

Ferranti

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what arrangements he is making to ensure the continued supply and maintenance of essential defence equipment provided by Ferranti;

(2) what steps he is taking to ensure that orders placed with Ferranti will be supplied according to contract.

Mr. Aitken: Officials of my Department have held preliminary discussions with the receivers of Ferranti International, to see what can be done to minimise any disruption to the completion of our contracts. These discussions will continue. Longer-term arrangements for the supply and maintenance of equipment procured from Ferranti will be considered in the light of progress of the receivership.

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implication of the entry into receivership of Ferranti for the ability of the United Kingdom armed forces to acquire equipment from domestic suppliers.

Mr. Aitken: For the immediate future, the receivers of Ferranti International have said that they wish to restore trading to near-normality as soon as possible. In the longer term, any effects on the availability of domestic suppliers of equipment for the armed forces will depend on the outcome of the receivership.

Non-departmental Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will show, for each of the executive non-departmental bodies sponsored by his Department, whether the public has a statutory right to attend all board or committee meetings and to inspect (a) the minutes of meetings, (b) the annual reports and (c) the annual accounts.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested in respect of MOD executive non-departmental public bodies—NDPB's—is as follows:

(a) and (b) the public does not have a statutory right to attend board meetings or committee meetings or to inspect the minutes of meetings of any of MOD's executive NDPBs.

(c) there is a statutory right for the public to inspect the annual accounts for all the service museums and for the annual report and accounts in respect of the Services Sound and Vision Corporation.

These documents are held by the Charities Commission and at Companies House respectively. In the case of the Oil and Pipelines Agency, the agency's annual report and accounts are laid before each House of Parliament.

Mr. David Hart

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, (1) pursuant to his answer to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) of 23 November, Official Report, column 42, if he will arrange for the Chief of the Air Staff to give a briefing to an employee of the hon. Member for South Shields;

(2) pursuant to his answer to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) of 23 November, Official Report, column 42, and his answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) of 29 November, Official Report, column 377, on what basis Mr. David Hart was given a briefing by the Chief of the Air Staff on a visit to RAF Strike Command on 27 May.

Mr. Hanley: Briefings on the RAF are given from time to time to Members of Parliament, academics and members of the media who have shown a special interest in defence matters. It was on this basis that Mr. Hart was given a briefing at Headquarters Strike Command on 27 May. I would be happy, similarly, to arrange a briefing for the hon. Member.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Hanley: The precise number of files held by my Department marked "Not for NAO eyes" could be established only at disproportionate cost.

The marking "Not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Department and the NAO and the PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes."

RAF Greenham Common

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) representations and (b) proposals he has received in respect of RAF station Greenham Common; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Since the beginning of 1993 my Department has received representations and proposals concerning: the removal of the airfield perimeter fencing on Crookham common and its reinstatement as a common with public access; the establishment of a monument to the cold war; the preparation of a planning brief by the district council for the reuse of surplus property, which envisages the creation of open space on Greenham common; the long-term reuse of the former American school; and the short-term use of the various facilities. All of these are being considered.

Our managing agents—Vail-Williams of Reading—have received over 200 inquiries and proposals for short-term lettings of the various facilities.

These inquiries include the following uses:

Equestrian facilities
Temporary film studios
Open storage for vehicles
Indoor storage
Offices
Leisure activities

The district council has consented to the principle of short-term lettings—subject to resolution of any planning issues—and planning applications have been made covering these proposals.

The district council has now produced a draft planning brief for public consultation; once adopted this should assist with the planning and future use of the surplus property.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Technology Foresight

36. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the earliest date by which the technology foresight process will have an influence on the allocation of funds by the research councils.

Mr. David Davis: The first results of the technology foresight programme will become available in early 1995. The Director General of the Research Councils, and individual councils, will be able to take the results into account thereafter.

HMSO

37. Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what savings have been made as a result of HMSO's market testing programme.

Mr. David Davis: The results of HMSO's market testing programme to date will save £2·4 million a year on a continuing basis.

Scientific Research

38. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proportion of money spent on scientific research is not defence related.

Mr. David Davis: In 1993-94, 57 per cent. of net Government expenditure on research and development will be spent on research objectives that are not related to defence.

Competing for Quality

40. Mr. Bates: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment his Department has made of the cost-effectiveness of the Competing for Quality programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Davis: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave provisional results, including the estimated £100 million savings generated, in his statement on 4 November. More detailed figures will be published in the citizens charter second report early next year.

Departmental Progress

41. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement summarising the progress made by his Department in the current year.

Mr. David Davis: Substantial progress has been made. In its first full year, the Office of Public Service and Science has:

published key statements on public service reform through its White Papers on the citizens charter and open government; completed a market testing programme which had led to savings of £100 million across the civil service by 30 September;
set out, in the White Paper "Realising Our Potential" the first Government-wide policy statement for over 20 years on science, engineering and technology.

And within the next few days the Department will:

run the second International Conference on "Service for the Citizen" which will underline the United Kingdom's role as one of the world's leading practitioners of public service reform; and publish a further White Paper, the 1993 review of next steps agencies in government.

Citizens Charter

42. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to introduce new charters.

Mr. David Davis: The last week has seen the publication of the courts charter for Northern Ireland. This brings the total number of charters to 38. The Benefits Agency will also be publishing an updated and improved version of its customer charter in the near future and there are a number of new charters planned for 1994. This is a part of the citizens charter's dynamic programme to raise the standard of all public services.

Magistrates Courts

43. Mr. Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received about changes to magistrates court arrangements in Stockport and Tameside.

Mr. David Davis: I have been asked to reply.

The Chancellor of the Duchy's responsibilities are for the appointment and removal of magistrates in Stockport and Tameside. He has not received any representations about changes to magistrates courts' arrangements in these two areas. Management of the courts is the responsibility of the Lord Chancellor's Department.

Passengers Charter

44. Mr. Luff: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations the citizens charter unit in his Department has received from the Central Transport Consultative Committee on the subject of the passengers charter.

Mr. David Davis: The citizens charter unit has received a number of representations from the Central Transport Consultative Committee on all aspects of the passengers charter, with particular reference to BR's standards and compensation arrangements. We appreciate the value of the CTCC's observations in ensuring that the passengers charter really does meet passengers' needs.

Open Government

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made with the open government initiative.

Mr. David Davis: Preparations for implementing the code of practice on open government are going ahead in the light of consultation responses. Mr. Paice: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what intentions he has to reform recruitment to senior posts within the civil service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Davis: I refer my hon. Friend to the written answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) on 22 November, columns 7-8.

NAO and PAC

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. David Davis: The marking "Not for National Audit Office eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments, the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the National Audit Office while they are current. A total of 122 Cabinet Office and OPSS files are so designated.

There is no marking "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mr. Tony Lundy

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Attorney-General when a decision will be made by the Director of Public Prosecutions concerning the allegations made against ex-Detective Superintendent Tony Lundy formerly of the Metropolitan police; when the matter was referred to her; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions was first made aware of the present investigation during the summer of 1991. On 5 May 1992, leading and junior counsel were instructed to examine the reports, statements and documents then available from the South Yorkshire police, who were investigating this matter under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority.

Between May 1992 and November 1993 further instructions were sent to counsel and they advised in consultation on a number of occasions. Counsel were preparing to submit their written advice to the Director in November 1993. However, fresh developments have required the police to open a new line of inquiry which they are pursuing as a matter of urgency. Until the results of this further inquiry are available, it is not possible to state when a final decision will be made.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Attorney-General what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

NAO and PAC

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Attorney-General how many files marked not for National Audit Office eyes are held by the Department; and how many are marked not for Public Accounts Committee eyes.

The Attorney-General: There are 19 files in the Departments for which I am responsible marked "Not for NAO eyes".

The marking "Not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

Executive Agencies

Mr. Burns: To ask the Attorney-General what plans he has to establish any of his Departments as executive agencies.

The Attorney-General: Consideration is to be given to the question whether it would be appropriate for three of my departments, the Crown Prosecution Service, the Serious Fraud Office, and the Treasury Solicitor's Department, to become agencies in Government under the next steps programme. I shall be setting in hand studies of the appropriateness of agency status in each case and will reach a decision in the light of this further work.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Weil's Disease

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list by regional health board for the last five years, and this year to date the number of people who have been infected by Weil's disease.

Mr. Ancram: Weil's disease is the more serious form of leptospirosis in humans but is not in itself notifiable. Leptospirosis has only been notifiable since April 1990 and the number of cases is as follows:

Notified cases of leptospirosis

Mr. Sackville: The Medical Devices Directorate of the Department of Health has issued 17 pacemaker technical notes and one hazard circular relating to pacemakers, and one safety warning letter related to heart valves, since it was established in August 1990.

Tilade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will order an investigation into the prescribing of Tilade and the way it has been promoted.

Mr. Sackville: Recent allegations in the press regarding the methods used by the manufacturer to promote the prescribing of Tilade are currently under investigation by the Prescription Medicines Code of Practice Authority under its guidelines on the promotion of medicines, copies of which are available in the Library. The production of Tilade is monitored routinely by the medicines inspectorate, as is the manufacture of all licensed medicinal products, we have no knowledge of any concerns which would justify a special investigation.

Prescriptions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many pharmacies in (a) Barnsley, (b) Doncaster, (c) Rotherham and (d) Sheffield dispose fewer than 1,700 prescriptions per month.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is in the table.

Funding Allocations

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of patients her Department assumes have private health assurance when adjusting funding allocations; and if she will make a statement.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the target percentage for registered disabled employees within the national health service; and what is the actual percentage of registered disabled employees.

Mr. Sackville: Although not bound by the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944, the Department which includes the national health service management executive has accepted the provision that 3 per cent. of employees should be registered disabled.

Dentists

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on remuneration for general dental practitioners in 1993-94.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government announced on 6 April 1993 that general dental practitioners were to receive the full 1·5 per cent. pay increase allowed under the Government's policy of restraint in public sector pay. This meant that dentists' target average net income—TANI—increased to £36,352. The dental rates study group met in the spring to consider how this increase in TANI could be paid, and agreed that the increase would be achieved by leaving in place the present scale of fees for dentists.

The group also agreed that should it appear that this fee scale was under or over-delivering TANI either the Government or the dental profession could ask that the group meet again. At a meeting of the dental rates study group held on 1 December, the group recommended that there should be an increase in the fees payable to dentists of, on average, 2·9 per cent. from January 1994. The Government have accepted this recommendation. This is to implement the pay increase of 1·5 per cent. already agreed, and does not alter the pay target of £36,352.

Death Rates

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to reduce regional variations in actual death rates.

Mr. Sackville: Concentrating effective action on reducing avoidable deaths in the five key areas of coronary heart disease and stroke, cancers, mental illness, sexual health, and accidents is a central plank of "The Health of the Nation" strategy. Within this strategy, the Government's approach to variations in health is set out in paragraphs 4.15 and 4.16 of the Green Paper—Cm 1523—and paragraph 2.5 of the White Paper—Cm 1986—copies of which are available in the Library.

In the 17 months since the strategy was launched, there has already been encouraging evidence of activity, both within the national health service and more widely. Responding to geographical and other variations in death rates from specific causes is one of the important elements of local strategies, both in the implementation of "The Health of the Nation" and in other fields of health policy—notably, perinatal and infant mortality.

Community Care Grant

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received regarding the requirement for local authorities to spend 85 per cent. of special transitional community care grant in the independent sector.

Mr. Bowis: The current requirement is for at least 85 per cent. of the social security transfer element of the special transitional grant to be used on community care services provided by the independent sector. We have received a number of representations from the independent sector, local authorities and others, all of which have been considered carefully. Details of the grant conditions for 1994-95 will be announced shortly.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of establishing the headquarters for the NHS Supplies Authority in Reading including (i) relocation of staff, (ii) furnishing of offices and (iii) landscaping.

Mr. Sackville: The cost of relocating National Health Service Supplies Authority staff to Reading was approximately £230,000. The accommodation was acquired as furnished by the previous tenants, so that only small items of furniture were purchased, at a cost of about £200. No landscaping costs have been incurred.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place a copy of the NHS Supplies Authority catalogue in the Library.

Mr. Sackville: The National Health Service Supplies Authority has catalogues for each of its six operating divisions. We are arranging for the copies to be placed in the Library.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department is currently consulting on proposals to determine new national health service regions and establish new regional health authorities. The proposed boundaries of the eight new regions are described in the consultation document, copies of which have been sent to all hon. Members and are available in the Library. It is proposed that the regional health authorities would share common boundaries with the new regional offices which are to be created as part of the national health service management executive.

Anorexia Nervosa

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what data has been collected by her Department in relation to the prevalence of anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa.

Mr. Bowis: The Department does not collect information on prevalence of conditions. Arrangements for assessing and meeting the needs of sufferers from anorexia and bulimia nervosa are matters for health authorities locally.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what official guidance her Department has issued to general practitioners or health authorities regarding the recognition of, and treatment for, anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa.

Mr. Bowis: Health authorities have been advised in the mental illness key area handbook to consider the need to provide access to specialist in-patient facilities for eating disorders on a sub-regional basis and making available family and cognitive therapy as part of their purchasing decisions. No specific further advice has been issued by the Department to general practitioners.

Community Day Care Services

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to require local authorities to charge for community day care services.

Mr. Bowis: Local authorities already have discretion to charge for day and domiciliary services and there are no plans to change this.

Hammersmith and Charing Cross Hospitals

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the report prepared by Price Waterhouse to inform the London Implementation Group on the future of Hammersmith and Charing Cross hospitals.

Dr. Mawhinney: No work has been carried out by Price Waterhouse for the London Implementation Group on this subject.

Young People (Containment)

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what powers exist for her to impose a curfew, in selected and known areas, on young persons aged under 16 years after 10.30 pm; and if she will make as statement;

(2) what powers exist to contain, restrain or apprehend persons aged under 16 who are clearly not under parental control and who might be judged at risk or in need; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no such powers. If a young person needs to be apprehended this would be a matter for the police. Under the Children Act 1989 an emergency protection order can be sought from the court if it is satisfied there is reasonable cause to believe the child would suffer significant harm.

NHS Staff

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average annual cost of employing (a) a senior manager, (b) a consultant, (c) a senior house officer, (d) a qualified nurse, (e) an ambulance driver, (f) a porter, (g) a medical laboratory, scientific officer and (h) a cleaner in the national health service for each year since 1986-87 at (i) cash prices and (ii) 1986-87 prices.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 23 June, at columns 181-82. Final figures for 1992-93 are not yet available.

RHAs (Capital Assets)

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the total capital assets of the regional health authorities both in cash terms and in terms of development potential.

Dr. Mawhinney: The total capital assets of regional health authorities in England in cash terms were, at 31 March 1993, £766,507,176.

The 1992 revaluation of the national health service estate provided regional health authorities with estimates of the development potential of their land and buildings. These figures are not available centrally.

Health Service Reform

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will happen to the realised and potential capital assets of the regional health authorities upon (a) a merger and (b) abolition.

Dr. Mawhinney: Proceeds from the sale of capital assets released through the merger or abolition of regional health authorities will be used for the benefit of patients.

Cars

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each year since 1990 the expenditure on cars for (a) regions, (b) districts and (c) trusts.

Mr. Sackville: The following information has been taken from the financial returns of regional health authorities, district health authorities and national health service trusts.

Expenditure on staff cars—leased and contract hire charges

	1991-92 £	1992-93 £
Regional Health Authorities	3,966,651	5,385,946
District Health Authorities	44,369,828	41,069, 621
Total	53,699,589	70,465,834

Notes:

1. Information for 1990-91 is not separately identifiable.
2. The data supplied for 1992-93 are provisional only.
3. The figures include the direct leasing/contract costs only.

Community Care

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to publish guidelines on charging for community care.

Mr. Bowis: Guidance was issued in December 1992 about residential care and nursing homes. Further guidance was issued in May this year and more will be issued shortly.

Repetitive Strain Injury

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the policy of her Department regarding the status of repetitive strain injury as a medically identifiable condition.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) on 4 November, at column 451.

NHS Managers

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many senior managers in the national health service there were on each spinal point 1 to 30; what was the flat salary on each point; what was the annual cost of employment per whole-time equivalent on each point in each year since the introduction of these grades; and what was the number of unit general managers in groups 1, 2, 3 and 4 and the number of district general managers in groups 1, 2 and 3, the salary range in each group and the annual cost of employment per whole-time equivalent in each group in each year since the introduction of these grades.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply the Under-Secretary of State—my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville)—gave him on 27 July at columns 835-39.

NHS Administration

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the administrative costs in each of the national health service regions in each year since 1987-88 in (a) cash prices, (b) 1987-88 prices and (c) as a percentage of total expenditure.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the NHS budget was spent on administrative costs in each year since 1986.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 3 December 1993]: The percentage of total revenue expenditure for the national health service in England spent on pay and pay-related costs of all staff at headquarters level, and their office costs and overheads, together with the total costs of the Dental Practice Board and the Prescription Pricing Authority is shown in the table.

2. The figures for 1992-93 are provisional.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide a table showing the number of hospital beds available by specialty in each region in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Sackville: The available information has been published and copies of the national and regional summaries are available in the Library. The data for the years 1979 to 1986 are contained in the publication "Hospital Statistics—Form SH3", which records bed availability at individual specialty level. The data for the years 1987-88 to 1991-92 are contained in the "Summary of Bed Availability—Form KHO3". These data are classified by broad ward category, recognising the more flexible use of bed facilities. The summaries for 1992-93 are to be published shortly and copies will be placed in the Library.

Hospital Managers

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what bonuses are payable to hospital managers; and whether the successful completion of a hospital closure is a matter for bonus payments.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 3 December 1993]: National health service general and senior managers are entitled to performance-related pay linked to individual success in achieving their authorities' objectives. NHS trusts determine the remuneration of their executive directors.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Fuel Poverty Assistance

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken by the Overseas Development Administration to provide fuel poverty assistance to states of the former Yugoslavia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Albania, Georgia and Iraq.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We provide humanitarian aid to all the countries mentioned, including Albania, in ways which take account of their overall needs and the responses of other donors. Our contributions specifically designed to help meet the energy requirements of refugees and other displaced people this winter are as follows:

£ million

	Bilateral	UK Share of EC
Former Yugoslavia	10·7	n/a
Iraq	3	3·1
Georgia		4·7
Azerbaijan		6·2

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much bilateral aid money has been spent in support of structural adjustment programmes in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The information requested is set out in the table.

1983	43·1
1984	32·3
1985	45·8
1986	60·3
1987-88	101·3

1990-91	145·7
1991-92	114·7
1992-93	133·1

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the EC's technical assistance in the Commonwealth independent states programme for nuclear safety; and what is the United Kingdom's contribution.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In the three years from the start of the TACIS programme in 1991, a total of 236 mecu—around £180 million—has been committed for work on nuclear safety in the former Soviet Union. The work has covered three main areas; plant operational safety, design safety and support to the regulatory authorities.

For 1993, the total budget for nuclear safety is 103 mecu or £80 million—which is allocated as follows:

	Mecu	£ million
Russia	48	37
Ukraine	32	25
Regional	8	6
EBRD (contribution to Multi-lateral fund)	15	12
Total	103	80

The regional programme will mainly cover Russia, Ukraine and Belarus with limited assistance being provided to Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan. Comparable figures for earlier years are not readily available.

The UK currently contributes around 16·5 per cent. to the total cost of the assistance provided by TACIS.

Environment Conference (Addis Ababa)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information the Overseas Development Administration has received on the outcome of the African ministerial conference on the environment, held in Addis Ababa, on 26 to 27 November, in regard to the effect of decisions upon aid programmes sponsored by his Department.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are seeking to obtain a report of the meeting and will consider its implications.

Dependencies (Aid)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the annual aid allocated for each year since 1979 to (a) Anguilla, (b) Bermuda, (c) British Antarctic Territory, (d) British Virgin islands, (e) the Cayman islands, (f) Diego Garcia, (g) the Falklands Islands, (h) Gibraltar, (i) Hong Kong, (j) Montserrat, (k) Pitcairn, Henderson, Ducie and Oeno islands, (l) St. Helena, (m) St. Helena dependencies, (n) South Georgia and South Sandwich islands and (o) the Turks and Caicos islands; what was the population of each dependency in 1979; and what it is today.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The information is as follows:

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for which of the overseas dependency states of EU member states the Development Council has agreed to finance environmental projects.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Development Council does not discuss individual projects. No EC-financed projects concerned solely with the environment are currently under way in the EC overseas countries and territories programme, although a regional environmental project for British Caribbean dependent territories is under consideration.

World Bank

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank voted in favour of the document "Expanding Access to World Bank Information" when this matter was discussed by the executive directors of the World bank; and if he will place a copy of the instructions to the executive director in the Library.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply he received from the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my right hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad), on 1 December at column 576.

European Development Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what matters were discussed and what decisions taken at the European Development Council in Brussels on 2 December; and what proposals were put forward by the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 3 December 1993]: My noble Friend Baroness Chalker of Wallasey attended the Development Council at which the main items were the mid-term review of the Lomé convention; follow-up to the 1992 resolution on development co-operation to the year 2000, including the adoption of a resolution on poverty alleviation; and agreement on a resolution on rehabilitation in countries emerging from crisis. All this work forms part of a long-term agreed work programme to which we are making a prominent and positive contribution.

SCOTLAND

Health Service Administration

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has to reduce the management costs of health boards and NHS trusts.

Mr. Stewart: The NHS management executive monitors the management costs of health boards and NHS trusts and is finalising revised arrangements appropriate to the new roles of boards and trusts.

Forestry Commission

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about the future of the Forestry Commission.

Sir Hector Munro: Around 3,000 individuals and 300 organisations have written to Ministers and to the Secretary and members of the Forestry Review Group, setting out their views on the work of the group.

NHS Trusts

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will issue guidelines to NHS trust hospitals concerning the practice of publicly advertising the private use of such hospitals on behalf of commercial organisations.

Mr. Stewart: No. It is for NHS trusts to decide how to make the best use of capacity over and above that required for NHS purposes. Income from non-NHS services is used to enhance benefits for all patients.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidelines he has issued to NHS trusts concerning the salaries of senior managers and others; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: On 12 November 1992 and 29 January 1993, chairmen of NHS trusts were informed that the increase in salaries of senior managers and other staff in 1992-93 should not exceed 1·5 per cent. Revised arrangements for the pay of general and senior managers have been commended to trusts in NHS circular MEL(1993)114 of 30 August 1993. I have deposited a copy of this circular in the Library.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how the start-up grant for each NHS trust is calculated; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Grants of up to £175,000 have been set aside for new NHS trusts. These are intended for one off expenditure in the run-up to the trusts becoming operational. Additional funds have been specifically secured and earmarked for this purpose.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the turnover of each NHS trust.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The information available for 1993-94 is as follows:

Trust	Forecast Income £000
Aberdeen Royal Hospital	111,165
Caithness and Sutherland	13,549
Dundee Teaching Hospitals	102,346
Grampian Healthcare	130,375

Raigmore Hospital	49,102
West Lothian	61,915
Ayrshire and Arran Community	53,995

Royal Scottish National Hospital	19,777
South Ayr Hospital	43,512
Southern General Hospital	75,568
Stirling Royal Infirmary	38,155
Victoria Infirmary	53,484
Yorkhill	49,696

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what training chairmen and non-executive directors receive on corporate governance following their appointments to NHS trust boards.

Mr. Stewart: Chairmen and non-executive directors attend induction conferences that include corporate governance among the subjects covered. In consultation with boards and trusts, the NHS management executive is developing additional opportunities for training in this and other areas.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the total accumulated receipts of NHS trusts that have achieved a 6 per cent. return on assets.

Mr. Stewart: Information is available only in respect of the two first-wave NHS trusts whose audited accounts have been published. The total receipts for these trusts in 1992-93 was £157,014,000. Both exceeded the 6 per cent. return on their assets.

NHS Staff

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to publish statistics for the numbers of whole-time equivalent staff in the NHS using the same breakdown as that adopted by the Greater Glasgow health board.

Mr. Stewart: Detailed statistics for staff employed by the NHS in Scotland are published each year in "Scottish Health Statistics". The 1993 edition is due for publication next month. The only extra feature of the data published in the 1991-92 annual report of Greater Glasgow health board is a breakdown into community and hospital categories. "Scottish Health Statistics" includes such a breakdown for nursing, medical and dental staff.

The classification of other staff in this way would require extra coding to be undertaken by the health authorities in order to provide the data centrally. A consultation exercise concluded earlier this month revealed that health boards, directly managed units and NHS trusts sought no increase in the level of data they are required to provide.

There are no plans to collect data splitting staff into the hospital and community categories at present.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has issued to national health service employers concerning the payment of unsocial hours allowances for staff.

Mr. Stewart: For staff whose pay and conditions are determined nationally a variety of agreements has been reached for different staff groups as part of their overall pay and conditions of service package. Details of such agreements are contained in handbooks.

NHS Staff

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) full-time and (b) part-time NHS employees there were in each health board area in each of the past five years.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The information requested is detailed in the table.

Murder

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) men and (b) women have been convicted for murder each year since the abolition of capital punishment; if he will present in tabular form the number of years each of these persons served before being released, classifying it by the year of conviction; and if he will indicate those (i) men and (ii) women who are still imprisoned by year of conviction.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is set out in the tables.

Scottish Homes

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of the system 3 poll commissioned by Scottish Homes to ascertain the attitudes of tenants to stock transfers.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scottish Homes has conducted a number of surveys in Scotland using system 3. The survey undertaken in the east end of Glasgow was commissioned, following a competitive process, at a cost of £3,800.

New Towns

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in respect of each of the Scottish new towns what is (a) the value of assets sold in each of the last five years, (b) the value of assets sold to date in the current financial year and (c) the financial targets set for the sale of assets in the current financial year.

Mr. Stewart: Information about the value of the assets sold is not available centrally. The actual receipts from the sale of assets are shown in the table.

Health Board Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether the successful bid for the urology contract with the Ayrshire and Arran health board was the cheapest bid made for the contract;

(2) on how many occasions the NHS management executive has intervened in tendering processes for contracts awarded by each health board during the last 18 months;

(3) if he will ask the NHS management executive to look again at the basis on which Ayrshire and Arran health board have awarded the contract for urology services to the South Ayrshire trust;

(4) what consideration was given by the NHS management executive to the urology contract awarded by Ayrshire and Arran health board to the South Ayrshire NHS trust after the executive had ordered a re-run of the tendering process;

(5) whether the purpose-built facilities for urology services within the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust will now be used; whether South Ayrshire NHS trust will have to build new facilities for the urology unit; how much the new urology facilities at the South Ayrshire NHS trust will cost; and how much the new urology facilities in the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust cost to build; (6) if he will make a statement outlining the procedure adopted by Ayrshire and Arran health board in awarding a contract for urology services to the South Ayrshire NHS trust;

(7) if he will make a statement on the NHS management executive's remit as regards scrutiny of the award of health board contracts;

(8) on whose instructions the NHS management executive ordered a re-run of the tendering process for urology services in Ayrshire and Arran health board; and whether this was supported by Ayrshire and Arran health board.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: The role of the NHS management executive in relation to contracting between health boards and NHS trusts is to ensure fair play and that contracts are awarded so as to improve patient care within available resources.

Following representations, the then chief executive of the NHSME asked Ayrshire and Arran health board to explain the background to its decision to award the area urology contract to the North Ayrshire NHS trust. From the information subsequently provided, it appeared that the tenders had not been prepared on a comparable basis. The health board accepted the NHSME's view that the two trusts should be invited to resubmit bids based upon a detailed specification.

The subsequent decision to award the contract to the South Ayr trust was a matter for the health board as purchaser and did not require further reference to the NHSME. The board's decision does not affect the viability of the day surgery unit at Crosshouse hospital which opened on 4 October 1993 at a cost of almost £1 million. The South Ayrshire NHS trust plans to open new day surgery facilities, estimated to cost £3 million, at the Ayr hospital in January 1995.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland to what extent the competing NHS trusts were given access to the original bids of the other NHS trusts bidding for the contract during the re-run of the tendering process for the urology contract in Ayrshire and Arran; and what is the standard practice in this matter.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: Specific guidance on conducting a tendering exercise for healthcare has not been issued centrally, but a paper on openness in the NHS—MEL(1993)38—was issued by the Scottish Office Home and Health Department. This paper set out a framework for those involved in contracting in which it was emphasised that a lack of openness within the negotiation process was damaging to long-term relationships. In the re-run of the tendering process for Ayrshire and Arran urology contract, each trust agreed to allow the other trust sight of its bid under the original tendering exercise.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what plans he has to commission an epidemiological survey into the incidence of myalgic encephalomyelitis; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if myalgic encephalomyelitis is recognised by his Department as a disease; how it is categorised; what special funding he has made available for its treatment; how much his Department is spending on research; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what advice he has issued to health boards on myalgic encephalomyelitis; what further advice he intends to issue; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Myalgic encephalomyelitis—ME—is widely recognised as a post-viral or chronic fatigue condition, although it is not at present included by the World Health Organisation in the international classification of diseases.

The Department has not issued any guidance to health boards on ME and no special funding has been made available for treatment. There is, as yet, no consensus on the form that treatment should take. The uncertainties associated with the diagnosis of ME would make it difficult to mount an epidemiological survey and the Department has no present plans to mount such a study.

The chief scientist office of the Scottish Office Home and Health Department is not currently funding any research related to ME, but is always prepared to receive and evaluate individual proposals for such research.

Hospices

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his policy regarding the provision of financial assistance to hospices in each of the past five years; when the provision of matching funding to hospices started and ended; how much in both capital and revenue terms was made available to hospices under this scheme; what financial support is now available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The 13 voluntary sector hospices in Scotland have benefited since 1 April 1990 from the Government's funding initiative under which at least 50 per cent. of their running costs are met from public funds. This initiative, which initially ran for three years, but has been extended until 31 March 1995, is a transitional measure designed to enable the hospices and health boards to work together to construct a sound basis for contractual relationships and future development. Public funding in the current financial year amounts to some £6 million. The initiative does not extend to capital costs.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he has taken to support the campaign for children's hospices in Scotland.

Mr Stewart [holding answer 3 December 1993]: Since the campaign was first drawn to our attention, the Government have consistently acknowledged the case for the establishment of a national children's hospice in Scotland but have taken the view that the voluntary sector was best placed to take this initiative forward. We have accordingly recognised the Children's Hospice Association Scotland—CHAS—as the national body responsible for the project and have awarded it a grant of £25,000 per annum towards their core administrative costs.

The Government's decision to make a contribution to the running costs of the children's hospice itself was announced on 26 November, Official Report, column 272. CHAS is receiving a special grant of £250,000 in each of the current and two subsequent financial years, making a total Government contribution to running costs of £750,000.

Domestic Violence Refuges

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many domestic violence refuges there are in Scotland; what plans he has to increase the total; what assessment he has made of the need for an increase in the number of such units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: There are 42 women's refuges in Scotland. We believe that local authorities are best placed to assess the local requirements for refuges and to develop services accordingly. However, the Scottish Office is providing grant under sections 9 and 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 to Scottish Women's Aid to enable it to develop services and possible information and advice. The grant for the current year is £115,000.

Witness Protection

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to establish a witness protection scheme in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 December 1993]: My right hon. Friend has no plans to introduce a national witness protection scheme. Provision already exists in law to take action against people who threaten or injure witnesses. Decisions about the level of protection to provide for witnesses in individual cases are an operational matter for the police.

Councillors Allowances

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing what the daily attendance allowance for elected members of local authorities in Scotland (a) was and (b) would have been in each year since 1974, had the system of payments (i) remained unaltered and (ii) been index linked; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Details of the allowances paid to individual local authority members are not held centrally.

Prior to 1991, each local authority was required to pay an attendance allowance but had discretion to determine the actual rate paid to elected members within the prescribed maximum specified in the Local Government (Allowances) (Scotland) Regulations 1975, as amended.

Since April 1991, each authority has determined its own arrangements within the requirements of the Local Authorities Etc. (Allowances) (Scotland) Regulations 1991, as amended. The regulations no longer require authorities to pay an attendance allowance.

The prescribed maximum amount of attendance allowance for a period of 24 hours between 16 May 1975 and 31 March 1991 is shown in the table. The table also illustrates, for the period until 1993-94, the effect which application of the annual GDP deflator would have had on the prescribed maximum of £10 payable in 1975.

Disabled People

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what studies his Department is currently funding, supporting or participating in which have direct relevance to people with disabilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The Scottish Office is currently funding 28 such studies to a total of £1·5 million. This demonstrates the Government's continuing commitment to their policy of encouraging people with disabilities to live independent lives fully integrated into the community. The studies are listed in the table.

Canniesburn Hospital

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will ask Greater Glasgow health board to consider which of its patients could be transferred to general surgical care under the Canniesburn hospital waiting list initiative.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: No. All the patients for whom treatment has been secured under the initiative involving the Bon Secours Health System, Glasgow have been asked by Greater Glasgow health board if they are willing to receive treatment in the private sector. Those who have indicated that they do not wish to be treated in the private sector have already been offered treatment at Canniesburn hospital.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for Greater Glasgow health board the number of patients under the Canniesburn hospital waiting list initative who have agreed to surgery in (a) the private sector within the west of Scotland, (b) the private sector within Scotland outwith the west of Scotland, (c) the private sector in England, (d) the NHS in Scotland, excluding the west of Scotland and (e) the NHS in England; and if he will also give the cost in each category for (i) the operation and escort and (ii) accommodation.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: There are two waiting list initiatives which Greater Glasgow health board has been leading on behalf of other, predominantly west of Scotland, health boards which are designed to secure treatment for a number of long wait plastic surgery patients.

The first initiative is to secure treatment for 800 patients at Canniesburn hospital where an additional consultant plastic surgeon has been recruited.

The second initiative has taken the form of a contract award, following a full competitive tendering exercise, to the Bon Secours Health System, Glasgow. Under the terms of the contract up to 572 patients are being offered treatment. To date, 23 have indicated that they do not wish to be treated under this initiative. These patients have been offered treatment under the initiative at Canniesburn hospital.

The contract with Bon Secours will cost around £500,000. This covers pre-operative assessment, treatment, accommodation and all necessary follow-up work for a mix of major, intermediate and minor procedures.

Raymond Gilmour

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of consideration of the application by Raymond Gilmour seeking the prerogative of mercy under the terms of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The petitions submitted on behalf of Mr. Raymond Gilmour on 8 January, 12 March and 27 May this year are the subject of detailed inquiries which are not yet complete. The hon. Member will be informed as soon as a decision has been reached on his constituent's case.

Influenza Vaccine

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when influenza vaccine will be available for all who require it.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Vaccine shortage arose as a result of the influenza outbreak occurring earlier than expected and the failure of one manufacturer's product to meet the required standard. Other manufacturers have increased production and the supply position is now improving. Sufficient supplies should be available to meet the needs of those groups identified in the Chief Medical Officer's letter of 8 October as being at risk by early December.

Anaesthetists

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate how often anaesthetists are required to work alone.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: This information is not held centrally.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the staffing levels of anaesthetists in NHS hospitals.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: The number of anaesthetists, whole-time equivalent, employed in NHS hospitals at 30 September 1992, the latest date for which information is available centrally, is shown in the table.

	Numbers
All (whole-time equivalents)	618
Consultant	303
Other career grades	28
Senior Registrar	42
Registrar	89
Senior House Officer	143
Other	13

While some NHS employers have recently experienced difficulty in recruiting anaesthetists, the number of senior registrars is greater than the service's forecast demand for new consultants in the next few years.

Intensive Care

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to ensure that surgeons, gynaecologists and anaesthetists have immediate access to recovery rooms, and high dependency and intensive care units, 24 hours a day.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: It is a matter for health boards as purchasers of care and the relevant unit or trust as the provider to make the necessary arrangements for access to recovery rooms and high dependency and intensive care units.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many, and what percentage, of paediatric intensive care units have nurse staffing of 6·4 whole-time equivalent or more per open bed.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The detailed information required to respond is not held centrally. What information is held, however, indicates that no paediatric intensive care units in Scotland have 6·4 whole-time equivalent nursing staff per occupied bed.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of nurses in adult intensive care units are RSCN; and what percentage have had paediatric intensive care training.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to improve intensive care facilities.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: It is a matter for health boards as purchasers of care and units or trusts as providers to ensure an appropriate standard and distribution of intensive care facilities.

Surgery

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to ensure that no urgent operations are delayed until regular operating lists are completed.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: Officials of the Scottish Office Home and Health Department issued detailed guidance in a letter of 31 January 1992 updated in the form of a management executive letter of 18 May 1993. The guidance set out the roles and responsibilities of managers and clinicians in the management of waiting lists and times and delivery of waiting time guarantees. It is for clinicians to assess the relative needs of each individual patient they take on to a waiting list in determining the priority for treatment.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how often emergency operations are being performed at night by doctors in training grades without supervision.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: This information is not held centrally. The training grades of doctors, which range from pre-registration house officer to senior registrar, have access to trained staff at all times.

Perioperative Deaths

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will carry out an inquiry into perioperative deaths similar to that carried out in NHS hospitals in England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: Studies of perioperative mortality have been carried out in Scotland for some years. From 1 January 1994 the whole of Scotland will be covered when the Glasgow audit of surgical deaths is merged with the Scottish mortality study to become the Scottish audit of surgical mortality.

This audit is funded by the clinical resource and audit group, part of the Scottish Office Home and Health Department.

Hypothermia

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many men aged 65 years and over and women aged 60 years and over have died from hypothermia in Scotland in each year since 1987.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 26 November 1993]: The figures requested are shown in the table.

Deaths with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate 1987-93

Year	Men aged 65 and over	Women aged 60 and over
1987	52	65
1988	34	72
1989	44	79
1990	47	72
1991	31	50
1992	44	47

[1] Provisional figures for events registered to 6 November 1993.

Superannuation Contributions

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements have been made for superannuation contributions transferred into trusts; and whether a trust may use any of the money for any other purpose.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 3 December 1993]: Employees of national health service trusts have the same rights to membership of the statutory national health service superannuation scheme as other NHS employees. Their contribution to the scheme, and those of their employers, are payable to the Exchequer to fund superannuation benefits, and cannot be used for any other purpose.

Health Service Workers

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the results of the survey of health service workers will be published; and if he will make it his policy to ensure that the state of morale among health service workers will be recorded in the published text.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 3 December 1993]: The results of the survey of approximately 40,500 NHS staff in Scotland were published on 29 November 1993. The report "What Those who Work Within the NHS in Scotland Think 1993" addresses the issue of staff morale.

A copy of the report has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Nurses (Teaching)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his target for the number of nurse teaching posts; and what estimate he has made of the number of nurse teaching posts which will be lost in (a) Scotland and (b) Glasgow in each year until the target is reached.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 3 December 1993]: The number of nurse teacher posts is dependent on the number of nurses who require to be trained. Retention of nurses has improved markedly over the last few years. As a result there has been a reduction in the number of student nurses in line with the number of job opportunities available. The effect of this is that the number of teaching posts in colleges of nursing and midwifery is being reduced. The management executive advised health boards in March 1993 of their view that colleges should seek to achieve a student:teacher ratio of 15:1 for preregistration nursing programmes by 1 April 1994. The number of teachers then required will depend on the assessments being carried out by health boards of the number of students required to enter training in 1994-95.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance he is giving as to how nursing teachers will be chosen for redundancy; what terms they will be offered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 3 December 1993]: No guidance will be issued to health boards on the redundancy of nursing teachers. This is a matter for individual health boards as employers to determine in the light of local circumstances.

Local Government Finance

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will specify for each local authority the amount of accumulated capital receipts.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 29 November 1993]: The arrangements operated in Scotland for the control of local authority capital expenditure differ from those operated in England and Wales. In Scotland local authorities must spend their capital receipts in the same year as they are raised if the receipts are to confer additional spending power. The system in Scotland does not, therefore, lend itself to the accumulation of capital receipts.

Sheriffs

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many sheriffs there are; and how many are women.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 30 November 1993]: There are 99 sheriffs in post, of whom 92 are men and seven are women. Of 114 temporary sheriffs, 109 are men and five are women.

Private Patients

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many private patients have been using national health service paid beds in Strathclyde for the first 10 months of 1993.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 30 November 1993]: Only provisional figures for the period January to August 1993 are available. One hundred and thirty-one private patients have been discharged from NHS hospitals in Strathclyde region. This compares with 313,803 NHS patients discharged for the same period.

Judges

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many judges there are; and how many are women.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 30 November 1993]: There are currently 25 judges of the Court of Session; all are men. In addition, there are eight temporary judges, of whom one is a woman.

Health Service Administration

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he intends to take in order to reduce bureaucracy within NHS hospitals and trusts.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 30 November 1993]: In negotiating contracts with NHS trusts, health boards are responsible for ensuring value for money. In addition, the NHS management executive is finalising new arrangements for monitoring management costs.

Committee of the Regions

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list his appointments to the European Union's Committee of the Regions by (a) name, (b) age, (c) occupation and (d) political affiliation; and what recent representations he has received concerning these appointments.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 30 November 1993]: Details of Scottish members and alternate members nominated for the Committee of the Regions of the European Communities are as follows:

Member's Name and Council and Political Affiliation	Current Age
Charles Gray: Strathclyde Region— Labour	64
Rosemary McKenna: Cumbernauld and Kilsyth District— Labour	52
Brian Meek: Edinburgh District— Conservative	54
Duncan McPherson: Highland Region— Independent	63
Daniel Coffey: Kilmarnock and Loudoun District— SNP	39

Alternative Members Name and Council and Political Affiliation	Current Age
Keith Geddes: Lothian Region— Labour	41
Jean McFadden: Glasgow District— Labour	52
Marcus Humphrey: Grampian Region— Conservative	55
Peter Peacock: Highland Region— Independent	41
Clive Sneddon: North East Fife District— Liberal Democrat	48

Occupation was not a consideration in putting these names forward and such details are not centrally held.

My right hon. Friend has received no recent representations concerning these nominations.

Income Statistics

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average per capita income in Greenock and Port Glasgow compared with (a) the Scottish average, (b) the United Kingdom average and (c) the European average in cash and percentage terms for the latest available year.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 30 November 1993]: Information relating to household income is not available below the level of Scottish regions.

Police (Rapid Response Cars)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many police forces operate rapid response police cars; what is the normal size of such police crews; and what are their main functions and activities.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 30 November 1993]: One Scottish force currently operates armed response vehicles on a full-time basis. Two vehicles, each manned by two firearms officers, operate within the force area on a 24-hour basis. Their primary function is to provide a rapid response to any incident which involves the use, or alleged use, of firearms and to provide initial containment until any necessary additional resources can be mobilised with a view to bringing the situation to a satisfactory conclusion.

Advocates

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many advocates there are in practice at the present moment; and how many are women.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 30 November 1993]: There are 323 advocates currently in practice, 54 of whom are women.

Health Boards

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many health board employees, in respect of each health board area in Scotland, each year since 1988 were engaged in administration; and what percentage they represented of the total number of persons employed by that health board in each of those years.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The information requested is given, in whole-time equivalent terms, in the table.

Health Boards

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each health board (a) the current annual account and (b) the present number of managerial employees.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The revenue allocation for each health board for 1993-94 and the managerial employees engaged by them at 31 March 1993 and detailed in the table.

Domiciliary Care

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what proposals he has to implement monitoring measures in relation to the requirement to spend 85 per cent. of the special transitional grant in the independent sector on domiciliary care; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what procedures he has introduced in order to monitor local authority compliance with the requirement to spend 85 per cent. of the special transitional grant for domiciliary care in the independent sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: There is no special transitional grant in Scotland. The necessary statutory powers are not available in Scottish legislation. My noble and learned Friend the Minister of State met representatives of local authorities on 13 August 1993 and made it clear that if necessary the Secretary of State would seek equivalent powers to those available in England and would if necessary ensure the success of our policy of promoting a flourishing mixed economy of care in Scotland. Arrangements for monitoring the community care reforms in Scotland are set out in circular SW 16/1993. A copy is in the House Library.

Registered Homes

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many registered homes have lost their registration in each of the past four years; how many of these were (a) private care homes, (b) private nursing homes, (c) charitable homes or nursing homes and (d) other; and under which provisions of the legislation the deregister took place.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Outturn details for adult residential care homes, including cancellation, are available only for the two financial years ending 31 March 1993. The table also gives details for the period 1 April to 29 November of the current year. Regional and islands council social work authorities have powers to refuse or cancel registration under section 62 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, as amended by the Registered Establishments (Scotland) Act 1987. Cancellation has occurred in only one case, and the others represent homes that have closed or reclassified as no longer requiring registration.

Domestic Fires

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many fires occurred in private dwellings in (a) Strathclyde and (b) the rest of Scotland in each of the past 10 years; how many fatalities where such fires took place occurred among (i) children aged under 14 years and (ii) other persons; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Based on reports from local authority fire brigades on fires attended, the numbers of fires and of fatal casualties in dwellings in Strathclyde, in other parts of Scotland and in Scotland as a whole in each of the years 1983-1992 are as set out in the table. An analysis of fatal casualties by age groups is being prepared and I will write to the hon. Member when this information is available.

The Government continue to seek reductions in fatalities by means of publicity and education initiatives and, as part of those campaigns, continue to promote the installation and maintenance of smoke alarms.

River Clyde (Dredging)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the annual cost of the dredging of the River Clyde; which organisations and other parties make a contribution to this operation; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 December 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to the information on the past annual costs incurred by the Clyde port authority in dredging the River Clyde given in my reply to him of 15 April 1993.

It is the Government's policy that port authorities, including Clydeport Ltd., should manage their businesses on a commercial basis; and that the costs of dredging should be met by charges to the users of ports or by other parties who benefit from the dredging.

I understand that Clydeport Ltd. is discussing the cost of dredging the River Clyde with the principal users and beneficiaries of the river at this time. These discussions are commercially confidential.

Prisons

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what new money is to be made available for (a) the construction of new prisons and (b) the renovation of existing prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 2 December 1993]: There are no plans for the construction of any new prison establishment in Scotland. However, planning is being taken forward for the provision of a new 50 prisoner place houseblock at HM prison, Greenock.

Subject to planning consent and other necessary approvals, construction work is provisionally scheduled to start in the latter part of 1994-95.

The estates strategy for the service is contained at chapter 9 of, and annex B to, the Scottish Prison Service corporate plan, a copy of which was deposited in the Library in August this year.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

London Convention

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will now publish the official position of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the issues considered at the London convention in early November.

Mr. Jack: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on 25 November, at column 118.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement about the operation of her Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Jack: My Department has no such unit. Documents generated by my Department which are given security markings are kept under routine review by the originating units, which must ensure that such documents are declassified or downgraded as necessary.

Hastings Shingle Bank

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will undertake a survey of the Hastings shingle bank to ascertain the impact on it of the aggregate dredging so far and the implications on the fishery of future dredging proposals.

Mr. Jack: The Ministry's directorate of fisheries research is conducting regular studies of the sediments and benthos in the area of the Hastings shingle bank. Although periodic studies of fish stocks in the English channel do not provide conclusive information about specific areas such as the shingle bank, catch statistics in the area appear to lend some support to the concerns expressed by local fishermen about crabs and sole.

A new survey programme will be starting in January using scallop dredgers in order to establish the distribution of overwintering crabs and to assess the significance of the shingle bank to the eastern channel crab fishery. In addition MAFF scientists are setting up a study to monitor the migration of sole across the bank to the shallow inshore waters. This survey work will cover the period of spawning migration next spring.

We will be weighing the implications of this work very carefully in formulating our advice under the Government view procedure.

Live Animals (Transport)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to her answer of 24 November 1993 to the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler) Official Report, column 65, what explanations he received from the Commission for its differing conclusions on the enforceability of journey limits for livestock as opposed to compulsory feeding and watering times.

Mr. Soames: The proposals for amendments to directive 91/628/EEC on protection of animals during transport were deposited in the Library of the House on 22 September 1993, reference 8441/93. The Commission's explanatory memorandum referred to the conclusions of the Scientific Veterinary Committee, which the Commission accepted, on the question of journey limits. They pointed out in particular that it would be simple to evade a journey limit by using intermediate places of destination.

Badgers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what method is used by her wildlife unit at Royal Air Force station, Aston Down in badger removal operations; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The wildlife unit surveys farms which have had a cattle tuberculosis breakdown for evidence of badgers. Where removal operations are sanctioned, it traps badgers live in cages and humanely destroys them.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations she has received in the last six months about the export of live animals; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The public response to campaigns from animal welfare organisations on transport of animals results in large numbers of representations to the Government. During the last six months, the Government have received over 23,000 pieces of correspondence and 136 petitions, representing approximately 8,000 signatures, on this issue. Proposals from the Commission to amend directive 91/628 on the welfare of animals during transport were sent to over 500 interested organisations and individuals for comment this summer. We received 86 replies.

In the negotiations, the Government are seeking Community rules which are properly enforceable and will provide strong welfare safeguards for all categories of animals during transport.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when her Department intends to review the current ban on the export of live cattle from the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The export of cattle over six months of age from the United Kingdom to other member states is prohibited under European Commission decision 89/469/EEC. This is because of the position on bovine spongiform encephalopathy. The EC Scientific Veterinary Committee in conducting a scientific evaluation on BSE in September 1993 endorsed the Community control measures on BSE. The position will be kept under review in the light of the improving disease situation.

The position in relation to third-country trade varies depending upon the import policies of the countries concerned. We are working hard to ensure that the relevant authorities of important potential overseas markets are aware of the improving BSE situation in the United Kingdom and that their import policies fully reflect this.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she will be able to provide figures for live animals exported to other EC member states since 1 January; and what will be the sources of her information.

Mr. Soames: Initial data recently released by the Central Statistical Office indicate that the value of exports of live animals to other EC member states for the first half of 1993 amounted to £83·1 million. However, this figure is subject to revision under the new arrangements provided by the INTRASTAT system. No details are yet available for the actual number of animals involved.

Further details can be found in the CSO's "Business Monitor MM20A: Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom with the World (including data for countries within the European Community: Intrastat)." A copy of this can be found in the House of Commons Library.

Cereals

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the change in cereal production between 1992 and 1993 expressed as a tonnage and in percentage terms in each European Union country and in the European Union as a whole.

Mr. Jack: The information requested is given in the table. It should be emphasised that 1993 figures in particular are only provisional at this stage.

Agricultural Production

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the value, in each year since 1979 of (a) the overall agricultural production in the United Kingdom, (b) overall food imports, (c) cereal and cereal substitutes imported into the United Kingdom and (d) cereal exports; and if she will express each figure as a percentage of the amount needed for self-sufficiency.

Mr. Jack: The table shows figures for agricultural gross product; the total imports to the United Kingdom of food, feed and drink, and the percentage of self-sufficiency of the United Kingdom in food and feed. The value of both imports and exports of cereals is also shown, but it has not been possible to include the element for imports of cereal substitutes in this reply. I shall write to my hon. Friend shortly with further details.

No statistics are available on self-sufficiency in cereal and cereal substitutes, but usage of cereals is known, and statistics on this are included in the final column of the table.

Mink

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is her estimate of the number of mink presently in the wild in the United Kingdom; and in which regions are they most prevalent.

Mr. Soames: The control of wild mink is the responsibility of occupiers of land the Ministry has not collected details of their numbers or distribution.

However, data published by the Joint Nature Conservation Committee and the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology show that wild mink are widespread, with particular concentrations in mid and lowland Scotland and south-west England.

Fur farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the minimum statutory size of a cage in which (a) Arctic fox and (b) mink may be kept on fur farms.

Mr. Soames: There is no legislation governing the minimum cage size for Arctic fox or mink.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will give details of the licensing arrangements necessary for the establishment and operation of a mink farm.

Mr. Soames: To qualify for a licence to keep mink, the farmer must comply with the conditions of the Mink (Keeping) regulations 1975 (as amended). These specify that mink must be kept in escape-proof cages or other containers and, except when they are in transit, within an enclosure or building which satisfies the requirements of the regulations. These requirements specify the height of the enclosures, the materials to be used to construct them and the measures which must be taken to prevent escapes. Additionally, every enclosure must have an appropriate number of cage traps, in case mink should escape from their cages.

Before a licence can be renewed, the farm is inspected by ADAS, the Ministry's advisers on wildlife, to ensure the farmer complies with the requirements of the legislation.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fox farms there are in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Soames: The keeping of fox species is not subject to control in England, Wales and Scotland and information is not, therefore, collected on the number of farms keeping this animal. In Northern Ireland, the keeping of one species of fox, the Arctic fox, is subject to licensing under the Arctic Fox (Importation and Keeping) Regulations 1988. No licences have been issued in Northern Ireland to keep this animal since the regulations came into force.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps she takes to ensure the proper qualifications of those involved in the killing of farmed fur-bearing animals; and what records are kept of such persons.

Mr. Soames: In monitoring welfare standards on fur farms, the state veterinary services operates to the guidelines laid down in the relevant recommendation adopted by the Council of Europe. That recommendation specifies that the killing of farmed fur-bearing animals must be carried out by a competent person. It does not require records of such persons to be kept.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the minimum acceptable specifications for the perimeter guard fences of mink farms.

Mr. Soames: The minimum acceptable specifications for the perimeter guard fences of mink farms are set out in schedule 2 to the Mink (Keeping) Regulations 1975, as amended. A copy of the regulations is in the House of Commons library.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions since 1984 an application for a licence for a mink farm has been refused; and what was the reason for each refusal.

Mr. Soames: The information requested is readily available only from 1987 onwards. Since then, no applications for licences to keep mink in a mink farm have been refused.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment she has made of the environmental and welfare needs of farmed fur-bearing animals; and what plans she has to make provision for such needs.

Mr. Soames: The Farm Animal Welfare Council's review of fur farming considered the environmental and welfare needs of farmed mink and fox. It concluded that there was insufficient evidence to make specific recommendations on the keeping of fur-bearing animals and recommended that the industry should carry out further research. Research is being carried out in other countries such as Denmark, Finland and the Netherlands, whose industries are large enough to bear the costs involved. We will be pressing for the best possible welfare standards on a European Community basis.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is her policy on offering free veterinary advice to fur farmers.

Mr. Soames: The state veterinary service provides fur farmers with free advice on animal welfare matters.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions in each year since 1984 her officials or the state veterinary service have visited mink farms for the purpose of (a) assessing welfare and (b) inspecting slaughter methods.

Mr. Soames: Records of veterinary visits to mink farms dating back to 1984 are not available. There are currently 15 mink farms in Great Britain, each of which is visited by the state veterinary service on an annual basis.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is her Department's policy towards the farming of Arctic foxes within the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: We are seeking the best possible welfare standards for all types of fur farming on a European Community basis.

Infant Formulae

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) by what date she is hoping to implement the provisions of the European directive on the marketing of infant formulae;

(2) if she will make a statement summarising the provisions of the European Community directive on the marketing of infant formulae;

(3) if she will make a statement setting out the arrangements which will be adopted for consultation about the provisions of the European directive on the marketing of infant formulae; and when that consultation will begin.

Mr. Soames: The Commission directive 91/321/EEC on infant formulae and follow-on formulae requires member states to introduce national laws by 1 June 1994. We will be seeking to meet that deadline.

Directive 91/321 lays down compositional and labelling requirements for infant formulae and follow-on formulae. Among these are requirements that the labelling of infant formula contains a statement concerning the superiority of breast feeding, and the use of any term that suggests that infant formula is equivalent or superior to breast milk is prohibited. Pictures of infants and other imagery that might idealise the product are also prohibited. The advertising of infant formula is permitted only in certain professional magazines and can contain only information of a scientific or factual nature. The directive prohibits manufacturers from supplying free or subsidised supplies.

Draft proposals for GB regulations implementing the directive have been prepared and were issued for consultation to interested parties in the normal way on Friday, 3 December 1993.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by her Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Jack: The marking "Not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which current documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO are not automatically available.

There are unlikely to be a great number of such files, but no central file record is kept in MAFF, and to obtain this information by a departmental inquiry to all the various registries would be very time-consuming and costly.

There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

Surplus Beef

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if she will make a statement as to how surplus beef released by the European Commission is being distributed in Nottinghamshire;

(2) if she will outline the mechanisms adopted by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce for the distribution of surplus beef released by the European Commission into the United Kingdom; and if she will list the local authority areas in which the distribution is being undertaken by (a) local authorities, (b) voluntary organisations and (c) individuals.

Mr. Jack: The distribution of produce to eligible recipients under the EC surplus food scheme is carried out through charitable or non-profit making organisations. This year, 1,055 organisations have been designated by Agriculture Departments in the United Kingdom to distribute 12,200 tonnes of beef released from intervention for processing and canning. The Intervention Board executive agency is currently co-ordinating deliveries of the beef to designated organisations which will then make their own arrangements to distribute the produce locally.

A list of designated organisations, including those in Nottinghamshire, has been placed in the Library of the House.

Non-departmental Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, for each of the executive non-departmental bodies sponsored by her Department, whether the public has a statutory right to attend all board or committee meetings and to inspect (a) the minutes of meetings, (b) the annual reports and (c) the annual accounts.

Mr. Jack: The public do not have a statutory right to attend board or committee meetings of executive non-departmental bodies; nor do they have the right to inspect the minutes of meetings.

In nearly all cases, legislation requires that the annual report and accounts are published and laid before Parliament. The exceptions are the Agricultural Wages Board and the agricultural wages committees, whose reports do not include the accounts because the costs of running the board and committees are met directly from MAFF and Welsh Office funds. Neither the board nor the committees control funds.

The annual reports and annual accounts of the bodies are available to the public, either free or at reasonable cost, except for the AWC and AWB, for which annual accounts are not prepared as noted above.

Ministerial Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Jack: The cost of providing a car service to the Ministers in this Department was £232,931 in the 1992-93 financial year. Four vehicles are involved.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Private Care Homes

12. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received regarding the financial difficulties facing people who have been in private care or nursing homes since before 1 April.

Mr. Scott: We have received several representations recently, both from individuals and representative bodies, about the income support limits for people in residential care and nursing homes.

Child Support Agency

13. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the work of the Child Support Agency since its operation began; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Ministers keep the operations of the Child Support Agency under regular review, as they do the operations of other next steps agencies. The Child Support Agency is still very new, but it has made a determined start on its important task of ensuring that more children receive more maintenance, more reliably.

15. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he last met the chief executive of the Child Support Agency to discuss its assessment of absent parents already making contributions towards the upkeep of their children.

Mr. Burt: I and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regularly meet the chief executive of the Child Support Agency to discuss a wide range of operational matters. The most recent of these meetings was on 16 November.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many representations he has received from hon. Members regarding the working of the Child Support Agency.

Mr. Burt: Since the agency began its operations in April 1993, this Department has received in the region of 3,700 representations from hon. Members, covering a range of views.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress is being made currently with the review of the operation of the Child Support Agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The Child Support Agency was set up to secure more maintenance, more reliably, for more children and that is what it is doing. We believe that the basic principles of the scheme stand up to scrutiny and are supported by the vast majority of people in this country. We have been looking very carefully at the comments and concerns being raised about the Child Support Agency and testing them against the basic structure and principles which are in place and which were endorsed by Members from all parties. If, after examination, we think we can make the scheme better still, we will do so.

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what statutory basis the Child Support Agency reveals to a former partner full financial details of the person he or she has divorced together with those of that person's second partner.

Mr. Burt: Regulation 10 of the Child Support (Maintenance Assessment Procedure) Regulations 1992 provides for a maintenance assessment notification, which is sent both to the parent with care and the absent parent, to show the details of protected income calculations which include the income of an absent parent's new partner. The intention is that sufficient information should be provided to both the parent with care and the absent parent to enable them to exercise their statutory right to seek a review or to appeal.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes he plans to the way in which the Child Support Agency is administering the collection of child maintenance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The Child Support Agency has a range of collection and enforcement powers to ensure that it is able to meet its objective of obtaining maintenance for children. The Government have no plans to change these powers, though they keep all aspects of the Child Support Agency under review.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether clean-break settlements are to be taken into account in the formula used by the Child Support Agency for assessing maintenance payments from absent parents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: The maintenance assessment formula already reflects the practical consequences of a capital or property transfer, commonly referred to as a clean break settlement between spouses, by allowing for the current housing costs of the absent parent and taking account of the parent with care's income including that from capital.

28. Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to amend the Child Support Act 1991.

Mr. Burt: The Child Support Act introduced a new way of assessing maintenance for children and ensuring that this would be paid. It reflects the Government's view that both parents are responsible for supporting their children where they are able to do so, even if their own relationship has broken down. The Government have no plans to amend the Act.

29. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his policy towards replying to letters from hon. Members about child support where the Member has raised a matter of Government policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Letters to Ministers from hon. Members, about child support policy will receive a ministerial reply. Letters about operational matters or individual assessments will, in general, be passed to the chief executive of the Child Support Agency unless substantive policy issues have also been raised.

20. Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many absent parents who were already paying child support under previously agreed arrangements are appealing against the additional payments assessed by the Child Support Agency.

Mr. Burt: The Child Support Agency does not currently collect information in the form requested. To the end of October, under 1 per cent. of assessments made had resulted in appeals.

Work-related Injuries

16. Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much of his Department's budget is used in social security payments connected with injuries sustained (a) in war and (b) at work.

Mr. Scott: In 1991-92, the latest year for which final figures are available, benefit expenditure on war disablement and war widows pensions totalled £842 million. This represented 1·4 per cent. of the Department's total benefit spending of £61,819 million.

In the same year, expenditure on industrial injuries disablement and death benefits totalled £655 million, or 1.1 per cent. of the Department's total spending.

Support for the Elderly

17. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures his Department has taken to maintain support for the elderly.

Mr. Hague: Since 1979, my Department has more than maintained the real value of the basic retirement pension; improved choice and flexibility in pension provision; and targeted additional resources to poorer pensioners. Spending on benefits for the elderly has increased in real terms by 40 per cent. since 1979—to nearly £34·5 billion in 1992-93. Also, as announced in the Budget last week, increases on the income-related benefits over and above the normal uprating will amount to 50p for single pensioners and 70p for couples in April 1994. The basic state pension rate will also be increased by 50p on top of the normal uprating plus an additional 20p for couples as part of the package of help for VAT on domestic fuel.

Pensioners' Incomes

18. Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioner households were in the bottom decile of the income distribution in 1979, and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hague: The most recent information is given in the table. The figures are counts of pensioners, not pensioner households, with a pensioner couple counting as two. Figures are given both in terms of before housing costs —BHC—and after housing costs—AHC.

Numbers and percentages of pensioners in the bottom decile, 1979 and 1990-91.

Notes:

1. Numbers and percentages relate to individuals in benefit units headed by a person over state pension age.
2. Individuals are located on the income distribution according to their equivalised household disposable income.

Pensioners' Incomes

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of (a) single pensioners and b) pensioner couples had incomes below one half of average household income each year since 1979.

Mr. Hague: An answer covering each year since 1979 could be supplied only at disproportionate cost. The available information is published in tables F1(BHC) and F1(AFC) of "Households Below Average Income 1979-1990/91", copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average gross weekly income of (a) single pensioners and (b) pensioner couples in the lastest year for which figures are available; and what has been the average growth in income of each group since 1979.

Mr. Hague: In 1990-91, information from the family expenditure survey shows that the average gross weekly income of (a) single pensioners was £110·20 and (b) pensioner couples was £214·80. This represents an average growth in income since 1979 of (a) 42 per cent. for single pensioners and (b) 41 per cent. for pensioner couples.

Note 1: Pensioner couples are couples where the husband is over state pension age.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of pensioners received at least 50 per cent. of their income from state benefits in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hague: The percentage of pensioners receiving 50 per cent. or more of their income from state benefits is as follows:

Pensioner couples: 61 per cent.
Single pensioners: 76 per cent.
All pensioners: 70 per cent.

Source: Information from combined 1990 and 1991 Family Expenditure Surveys covering period 1990-91.

Note 2: "All pensioners" are single people over state pension age and couples where the husband is over state pension age.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the value of the basic state retirement pension for (a) a single pensioner and (b) a pensioner couple in 1979 and at each uprating since 1979; and what it would have been if it had been uprated in line with whichever was the higher of average earnings or prices.

Mr. Hague: The information is in the table.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much the state pension for (a) single pensioners and (b) pensioner couples would have been in April had the pension been uprated in line with the higher of retail prices index or earnings since 1980.

Mr. Hague: (a) £74·55 for single pensioners and (b) £119·30 for pensioner couples at April 1993.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his best estimate of the number and proportion of (a) single pensioners and (b) pensioner couples who have total gross weekly incomes of (i) £0 to £50, (ii) £50 to £100, (iii) £100 to £150, (iv) £150 to £200, (v) £200 to £250, (vi) £250 to £300, (vii) £300 to £350, (viii) £350 to £400, (ix) £400 to £450, (x) £450 to £500 and (xi) £500 and above.

Mr. Hague: The information is in the tables. To allow a reliable number of sample cases to be taken into account certain ranges of the distribution have been merged in order to ensure estimates are based on at least 100 cases. The estimates are liable to error.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was (a) the mean and (b) the median income of (i) single pensioners and (ii) pensioner couples, before and after housing costs, in 1990-91.

Family Credit

19. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the annual spending on family credit, and what was the spending on family income supplement in 1979.

Mr. Burt: Family credit expenditure is expected to be £965 million in 1993-94. This is 14 times more in real terms than the £24 million spent on family income support in 1978-79.

Housing Benefit

21. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures his Department is taking to encourage local authorities to stop fraudulent claims of housing benefit.

Mr. Burt: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has recently announced improved incentives which will encourage local authorities to increase their efforts against fraud. Local authorities will now be able to share to a greater extent in the savings produced through the detection of fraud. Subsidy reductions, next year, will be targeted at authorities that do little or nothing to uncover fraud.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much was paid in housing benefit (a) nationally and (b) in the London borough of Ealing in each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The available information is in the table.

Personal Pensions

23. Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the results of his Department's policies to encourage personal pensions.

Mr. Hague: The Government are committed to encouraging choice and flexibility in pension provision, and has already introduced two new options for contracting out of the state earnings-related pension scheme—appropriate personal pensions and contracted-out money purchase occupational pension schemes. It is clear that individuals wish to take advantage of the choices available to make provision for their own retirement—more than 5 million people have used personal pensions to contract out of the state earnings-related scheme since the option was introduced in 1988. A 1 per cent. additional rebate for appropriate personal pension holders aged 30 and over was introduced from April 1993, fulfilling our manifesto commitment and ensuring that personal pension holders continue to find it worth while to maintain their pensions. The Government are considering measures to ensure that personal pensions remain attractive across the age range.

Lone Parents

24. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to give additional support to lone mothers and lone fathers.

Mr. Burt: We have already improved the incentives to work in the social security system so that lone parents are currently £30 a week better off in work and receiving family credit than out of work and on income support.

From October 1994, we will provide additional support for both lone parents and couples through a £40 disregard of child care costs. This will provide a powerful incentive for families to move back into work with family credit and make themselves better off.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to give greater support to single parent families.

Mr. Lilley: We have already improved the incentives to work in the social security system so that lone parents are currently £30 a week better off in work and receiving family credit than out of work and on income support.

From October 1994, we will provide additional support for both lone parents and couples through a £40 disregard of child care costs. This will provide a powerful incentive for families to move back into work with family credit and make themselves better off.

Maxwell Pensions Unit

25. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a further statement on the work of the Maxwell pensions unit.

Mr. Hague: In addition to its continuing work with those engaged in the recovery of pension scheme assets, the unit is providing substantial administrative assistance to the Maxwell Pensioners Trust. The Government fully support the trust's initiative to promote an overall settlement of disputes relating to missing Maxwell scheme assets as an alternative to prolonged and costly litigation.

Benefit Fraud

26. Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress his Department has taken to reduce the level of fraudulent claims for social security benefits.

Mr. Scott: We are placing a greater emphasis on fraud prevention by increasing staff training and making more use of information technology. A range of other initiatives currently under way include a one-stop service, research into strengthening identity requirements and better verification details for claims and payments of benefits.

Last year, our investigators caught more than 270,000 people cheating the system, making record savings of £558 million.

Social Security Expenditure

27. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what research he has commissioned into the long-term levels of resources to be devoted to social security expenditure by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: The Department has an active research programme, drawing on internal and external research. The results of the most recent research were published in July in the Department's report "The Growth of Social Security", which was intended to stimulate and inform public debate on the social security programme.

Invalidity Benefit

30. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes he proposes to the payment of invalidity benefit.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made to the House on 1 December, Official Report, column 1037.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the effect of the assessment he has made of proposed changes in invalidity benefit and pension age on the appeal against the social security commissioners' decision which concerned the IVB rules linked to state pension age.

Mr. Scott: The appeal has been listed for hearing by the Court of Appeal on either 14 or 15 February 1994. The proposals which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 1 December 1993 do not affect the decision to proceed with this appeal.

Pensioners' Benefits

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by how much more than inflation benefits for poor pensioners have been increased since 1989.

Mr. Hague: The total extra help above normal upratings made available to pensioners on income-related benefits since 1989 is now worth around £1 billion a year.

State Earnings-related Pension Scheme

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of people (a) male and (b) female covered by SERPS; and what percentage of the work force this is in each case.

Mr. Hague: The answer is in the table.

Total	9·7	43·7
All men	4·5	38·8
All women	5·2	49·1

[2] Source: Labour Force Survey—Employment Gazette. United Kingdom 1990-91 (excluding self-employed persons, Her Majesty's Forces and persons on work related government training schemes).

The figures are based on the number of people who paid class 1 contributions at the not-contracted out rate; excluding those people with appropriate personal pensions.

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many men with earnings above the lower earnings limit were not contracted out of SERPS during the latest year for which figures are available;

(2) how many women with earnings above the lower earnings limit were not contracted out of SERPs during the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hague: In 1990-91, the numbers of (a) men, and (b) women, in the United Kingdom who paid class 1 national insurance contributions and were not contracted out of SERPS, or were not holders of an appropriate personal pension in place of SERPS, were (a) 4·54 million and (b) 5·25 million.

Source: 1 per cent. sample of National Insurance contributors.

Disabled Children

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to increase benefits for families of children with disabilities.

Mr. Scott: Families with disabled children have access to a wide range of social security benefits, including, for example, invalid care allowance, disability living allowance and child benefit. On 1 December 1993 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced that all major benefits would be increased in April 1994 fully in line with inflation, with additional help to meet the cost of VAT on fuel for more than 15 million people.

Brain Damage

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many awards have been made under the Vaccine Damage Act 1979 for brain damage sustained in each year between 1976 and 1992; and how many of these awards were for damage following injections of triple and/or pertussis vaccines.

Mr. Hague: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Social Fund Commissioner

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what decision he has made about the appointment of a new social fund commissioner; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I am pleased to announce that Mrs. Rosalind Mackworth has agreed to serve as the Social Fund Commissioner for Great Britain for a further period of 18 months from 1 December 1993. I understand that Mrs. Mackworth has also agreed to act as Social Fund Commissioner for Northern Ireland.

Since taking up the post of Social Fund Commissioner in December 1987, Mrs. Mackworth has been instrumental in establishing the social fund inspectorate as a respected and independent source of review. I am sure that I can rely on Mrs. Mackworth to maintain and even improve upon her excellent record.

Pensions

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to ensure that those choosing to opt out of the state earnings-related pension are informed of the risks to their pension due to the loss of the guaranteed returns offered by SERPS.

Mr. Hague: Some 15 million people are contracted out of the state earnings-related pension schemes—SERPS. Around 10 million of these are members of their employer's pension scheme and 5 million have a personal pension. Members of salary-related occupational schemes will receive a guaranteed minimum pension—GMP—at state pension age from their employers, provided as a condition of contracting-out of SERPS. There is no risk that an individual's pension entitlement will be lower than that offered within SERPS.

Individuals with a personal pension build up their own fund based on contributions made by themselves, their employer and the Government. The Government's contribution reflects the level of investment required to provide a pension equivalent to a GMP. These contributions and the return on their investment form "protected rights" guaranteeing a minimum value for the fund. An occupational money purchase scheme works in a similar way with the Government's contribution being provided through a rebate in the amount of national insurance contributions payable.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to monitor the performance of the investment funds associated with the personal pension plans of those who have opted out of SERPS; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: It is for individual scheme members, in conjunction with their financial advisers, to monitor the performance of their chosen pension scheme. In order to help them to do so, the trustees of personal pension schemes are required to provide to members, at least once in every period of 12 months, written details of the value of the member's protected rights under the scheme and the value of the member's accrued rights, other than protected rights.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his estimate of the number of those taking out personal pensions and who (a) have and (b) have not opted out of SERPS who have allowed their policy to lapse after (i) one year, (ii) two years, (iii) three years, (iv) four years and (v) five years;

(2) what is his estimate of the total sum lost by policy holders who have allowed personal pension plans to lapse (a) after one year, (b) after two years, (c) after three years, (d) after four years, (e) after five years and (f) in total.

Mr. Hague: Personal pensions used for opting out of SERPS do not lapse. Membership continues until cancelled either by the individual concerned or by the trustees or managers of the scheme. Personal pensions not used for opting out of SERPS become paid up when the member ceases to make payments into the scheme. In both cases, those contributions which have already been paid into the schemes continue to be invested to produce benefits for the contributor.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his estimate of the total sum charged in commission on the personal pension plans of those who have opted out of SERPS and who make additional contributions to their plans for the last year for which figures are available;

(2) what is his estimate of the total sum charged in commission on the personal pension plans of those who have not opted out of SERPS for the last year for which figures are available;

(3) what is his estimate of the total sum of charges other than commission made on the personal pension plans of those who have opted out of SERPS and who make additional contributions to their plans for the last year for which figures are available;

(4) what is his estimate of the total sum of charges other than commission made on the personal pension plans of those who have not opted out of SERPS for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hague: The data requested are not collected. Consideration of the level of charges and commissions associated with personal pensions is a matter for individual investors in their choice of scheme. The Financial Services Act 1986 governs the disclosure to investors of charges and commissions associated with life insurance based products. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has recently directed the Securities and Investments Board to come forward with new rules and proposals to make the costs associated with life insurance based investment products, including most personal pensions, more transparent.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his estimate of the total sum charged in commission on appropriate pension plans for the last year for which figures are available;

(2) what is his estimate of the total sum of charges other than commission made on appropriate pension plans for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hague: The data requested are not collected.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to ensure that the state earnings-related pension can operate in such a way as to provide an alternative to private provision for those who wish to make full provision for their retirement.

Mr. Hague: The state earnings-related pension is already one of several alternatives available to individuals choosing how best to make provision for their retirement.

Benefit Statistics

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what will be the saving in the whole range of social security benefits, including exemption from prescription charges and other associated benefits, if everybody was deemed to have earned £100 per week between the ages of 18 to 65 years who was fit and able to work.

Mr. Scott: I shall let my hon. Friend have such information as is available as soon as possible.

Income Support

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people received income support transitional protection in 1988 in (a) Newham and (b) nationally; how many in each of the same areas received no income support increase due to transitional protection in each successive year; and how many of these had (i) pensioner premia and (ii) disability premium.

Mr. Burt: The figures for those receiving income support transitional addition in Great Britain are in table 1. It is not possible to provide reliable figures for Newham. Those with a transitional addition in May of each year would not have received an increase at the uprating in the April of that year. However, the following increases over and above normal uprating were made available on top of transitional additions:

October 1989—new rate of pensioner premium introduced for those aged 75-79 and special increase in higher pensioner premium—worth £2·50 a week for a single person and £3·50 for a couple.

October 1991—increase in family premium, child personal allowances and under age 25 single personal allowances.

October 1992—all pensioners premiums increased by £2 for a single person and £3 for a couple.

Table 2 shows the numbers receiving a special transitional addition in Great Britain. All will have benefited from upratings as special transitional additions are increased by the normal uprating factor used for income support.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) on 3 December 1993. There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications have been assessed for the disability allowance for chronic bronchitis and emphysema; and, of those assessed, how many have been successful.

Mr. Scott: As at 28 November 1993, about 9,000 cases had had all necessary employment and medical inquiries completed, and of these about 1,100 will receive an award of industrial injuries disablement benefit.

"Fighting Fraud in 1992-93"

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total cost of producing the report "Fighting Fraud in 1992-93"; how many copies were printed; and how many have been circulated to date.

Mr. Hague: The administration of benefit fraud is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 3 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security, asking what was the cost of producing the report Fighting Fraud in 1992/93; how many copies were printed; and how many have been circulated to date.

I am able to tell you that the total cost of producing the report was £3,679·43. A total of 1,800 copies were printed and as at 26 November, 1,446 have been circulated.

I hope that you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will appear in the Library.

Claimants, Doncaster

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in the Doncaster area were receiving invalidity benefit for each year ended April in (a) 1990, (b) 1991, (c) 1992, (d) 1993 and (e) 1993-94 to date.

Mr. Scott: The administration of invalidity benefit is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security, asking how many people in the Doncaster area were receiving Invalidity Benefit for each year ended April in (a) 1990, (b) 1991, (c) 1992, (d) 1993 and (e) 1993-94 to date.

The information is not available in the format requested. This is because separate statistics were not kept for Invalidity Benefit (IVB) claimants until May 1991 and a yearly count of recipients is not maintained. I should also explain that, because Agency District boundaries do not correspond with county or borough boundaries, a small part of the Doncaster area falls within that of the Mexborough Benefit Office within the Agency's Rother and Dearne District.

Statistics covering the small number of Mexborough customers who live in the Doncaster area could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, I have provided details for the area covered by Doncaster District only. The latest available figures show that on the last working day of October 1993, 14,370 people were claiming IVB.

On the last working day of May 1991, the figure was 12,558 and on the last working days of April 1992 and April 1993, 11,662 and 12,953 respectively.

The statistics include some customers who have claimed but are not actually receiving IVB. This is because there are circumstances in which although there is underlying entitlement to IVB, because a higher overlapping benefit is in payment, no IVB is actually paid. These figures were obtained from a 100 per cent. clerical count of cases in the District Office.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Disability Living Allowance

Ms Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the increased use of doctors to make assessments for disability living allowance claims.

Mr. Scott: The administration of disability living allowance is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Ms Kate Hoey, dated 3 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security, asking if he will make a statement on the increased use of doctors to make assessments for disability living allowance claims.

Decisions on Disability Living Allowance continue to be made by independent adjudicating officers. Wherever possible, these are based on information provided by the customer on the claim form and on guidance in the Disability Handbook. In some cases other evidence is needed, perhaps in the form of a medical examination. Of course, a person may ask for a medical examination rather than supplying additional supporting information.

It is true that the number of medical examinations has increased this year, reaching a peak in August 1993 when 28% of cases were decided following a report by an Examining Medical Practitioner (EMP). This compares with 20% of cases in April 1993. However, numbers are now decreasing again and in October 1993, 25% of cases were referred to an EMP.

A number of factors have contributed to this increase:

a large proportion of customers are requesting a visit from an EMP in preference to completing the self-assessment part of the claim form.

as Adjudication Officers gain in experience they recognise more readily the cases which would be more effectively dealt with by an EMP's visit. For example, because a customer may be understating their needs.

Self assessment has been widely welcomed. However, we would not want to reduce the element of choice by discouraging anyone from asking for a medical examination if that is what they prefer.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 7 December 1993

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor's Department provides cars for the Lord Chancellor and myself. The annual cost of providing this service is £119,184 (for the year to November 1993). The cost includes two vehicles maintained on a permanent basis and a limousine as required.

Succession

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in relation to United Kingdom ratification of the Hague convention on succession.

Mr. John M. Taylor: In March 1990, following the opening of the Hague convention on succession for signature in 1988, the Government issued a consultation paper to obtain views as to whether the United Kingdom should, with a view to ratification, amend its rules as to which law governs succession to a deceased person's estate to bring them into line with the rules in the convention. The response did not indicate a large degree of support for United Kingdom ratification and there was some opposition. The Government therefore decided not to proceed further at present, but the matter is being kept under review. So far only two other member states have signed the convention and there have been no ratifications.

Torture

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to seek a change in the civil law to allow actions in the English courts for compensation for torture inflicted overseas in violation of international law and enforcement of judgment in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John M. Taylor: There are no plans to amend the law in the way referred to. Under the present law there are circumstances in which a victim of wrongful conduct abroad may sue in England: the jurisdictional rules vary according to the country in which the wrongful conduct took place. A judgment of an English court awarding compensation in such a case will be enforceable throughout the United Kingdom and in certain other countries.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Development Corporations

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total budget allocated by his Department in 1992-93 to urban development corporations in (a) Teesside, (b) Tyne and Wear and (c) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Baldry: The answer is as follows:

(a) £40·3 million grant in aid;
(b) £44·1 million grant in aid;
(c) the 12 English urban development corporations (and the docklands light railway) received grant in aid of £515·8 million.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Northern Ireland are responsible for grant in aid paid to the Cardiff Bay and Laganside development corporations respectively.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Gummer: The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government Departments are stated in the Government IT security policy document. This documenht is supported by the use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method (CRAMM) and baseline security for IT systems (BSITS) risk analysis methods, and by supporting advice and guidance published by the Government IT security authorities. These have been developed specifically for use within government and are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

Council Tax

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes he is considering in connection with the council tax system; and when he expects to make an announcement.

Mr. Baldry: My Department is presently consulting the local authority associations about regulations to give an effect to the scheme of transitional reductions for 1994-95 announced by my right hon. Friend on 2 December, and about some minor changes to the Council Tax (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations 1992. I have sent copies of the consultation letters to the hon. Member and I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library of the House. A number of suggestions have also been put to us for small changes to the secondary legislation covering council tax exemptions and discounts, and we are considering these.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to help the severely mentally impaired living in the community with their council tax.

Mr. Baldry: Severely mentally impaired people are not counted towards the personal element of the council tax.

A household entirely composed of such people is therefore eligible for a 50 per cent. discount from their council tax bill. This liability may be partly or wholly rebated by council tax benefit, depending on the household's circumstances.

We have received a number of representations in favour of further assistance for this group. We are considering these representations. I will write to the hon. Member when a decision is reached.

Construction Industry

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the cost to builders of building and associated products.

Mr. Baldry: I have received no direct representations.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration his Department will give, in making the final decision concerning THORP, to the current status of the negotiations between BNFL and Nuclear Electric or Scottish Nuclear over spent nuclear fuel contracts for THORP.

Mr. Yeo: All relevant consideration will be taken into account by my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in reaching their decision.

Incinerators

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the incinerators in the north west licensed to incinerate BSE-infected cattle and scrapie-infected sheep; and how many such carcasses were destroyed in each of the last 12 months at each incinerator.

Mr. Yeo: Under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 clinical waste incinerators with a capacity of 1 tonne or more an hour require authorisation by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and those with a lesser capacity require an authorisation from the relevant local authority.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has to date authorised no clinical waste incinerators in the north west. From the statistical information collected by my Department, 41 incinerators with a capacity of under 1 tonne an hour were authorised by local authorities in the north west by the end of June 1993. My Department does not hold a central list of these incinerators. However, it is likely that most of these will be incinerators burning clinical waste. Information about each incinerator, including a copy of the application for authorisation, must be included in a public register held by each local authority for the processes for which it is responsible.

Tendering

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to ensure that, when putting contracts out to tender, his Department includes on the tender list companies which have acquired the BS5750 quality assurance standard.

Mr. Baldry: My Department fully recognises the value of BS5750 as a quality assurance standard but it does not make this, as a matter of course, a prerequisite for tendering in order to allow small firms, for which the cost of certification can represent a burden, the opportunity to compete.

Leasehold Enfranchisement

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Government will support the establishment of a leasehold enfranchisement advisory service.

Sir George Young: I am pleased to announce that the Government has approved the application from the Leasehold Reform Co-ordinating Committee for financial assistance to enable the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service for England and Wales to be established. The Department of the Environment has agreed to make a grant through its special grants programme of £27,575 in 1993-94 and £73,000 in 1994-95. The Welsh Office will also contribute £1,000 in 1994-95. I anticipate that similar amounts will be made available for 1995-96, subject to the satisfactory performance of the service.

In addition, they have received offers of support for the service from private sector organisations worth over £35,000 per annum.

The aim of the agency will be to provide information to the large number of leaseholders whom we anticipate will wish to take advantage of the provisions contained in the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 which took effect on 1 November. These enable qualifying leaseholders either to purchase jointly the freehold of their flats or to purchase new long leases.

I expect the service to have a very important role to play in advising both landlords and tenants about the necessarily complex procedures involved in exercising these new rights.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if there will be transitional costs arising from local government reorganisation.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 6 December 1993]: There will be some start-up costs associated with reorganisation, which we expect authorities to keep to an absolute minimum, and which in the longer term can be offset against savings arising locally from the reorganisation.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he has made to ensure that local authorities and council tax payers not involved in local government reorganisations are protected from any transitional costs resulting from areas that are reorganised.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Transitional reorganisation costs will be incurred only by those authorities in the areas that are reorganised. As my right hon. Friend announced to the House on 2 December, we intend that authorities should be able to meet by borrowing any such costs incurred by them in 1994-95, and that any borrowing should be repaid from savings or sales of assets after reorganisation.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Security Services

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration he has given to publishing (a) a full or (b) an abridged version of the chief of the intelligence services' annual report to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Hurd: The Intelligence Bill provides for the Prime Minister to lay before Parliament annual reports by both the Intelligence Services Commissioner and the Intelligence Services Committee. We do not intend to publish the annual report of the chief of the Secret Intelligence Service.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the Ministers in his Department who since June 1987 have visited (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malaysia, (c) Singapore and (d) South Africa on official business; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met members of Conservatives Abroad in the course of his visit to South Africa in July 1991. My right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Chalker of Wallasey attended a Conservatives Abroad reception in South Africa in February 1991. There is no record of any other party political activities by FCO Ministers during the course of official visits to the countries concerned since June 1987.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the meeting of the CSCE of Ministers in Rome.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs represented the United Kingdom at the Council meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe which took place on 30 November and 1 December in Rome.

The Council decided to develop the CSCE's capabilities in conflict prevention, crisis management and in combating aggressive nationalism. Ministers endorsed arrangements for more comprehensive monitoring and oversight of peacekeeping forces deployed in Georgia. In this and other conflicts oversight and monitoring must ensure that third party military forces are deployed with the consent of the parties, respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of CSCE states, are impartial and multinational in character, have a clear mandate and are integrally linked to a political process. There must be a plan for their orderly withdrawal.

The Council welcomed the resumption of peace talks in Geneva on the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. They urged the parties to take advantage of the initiative represented by the European Union action plan and called for the early, unconditional return of CSCE missions to Kosovo, Sandjak and Vojvodina. The Council emphasised that the CSCE stood ready, in co-operation with others, to rebuild civic society.

I regret that despite intensive negotiations the Council was unable to agree on any new steps to resolve the conflict dealt with by the Conference on Nagorno-Karabakh. Ministers asked the Chairman of the Minsk Conference to explore urgently the possibility of providing new impetus to the peace process.

The Council welcomed the withdrawal of Russian troops from Lithuania and stressed the political significance of speedy withdrawal of those remaining in Estonia and Latvia. The Council called for an early, orderly and complete withdrawal of the Russian 14th Army from Moldova and expressed concern at the lack of progress in finding a political solution to the problems of the Transdniester region. The Council decided to establish a CSCE mission to Tadjikstan to promote respect for human rights, democracy and the rule of law.

The Council reiterated the fundamental importance of respect for human rights and decided to strengthen the CSCE's instruments of conflict prevention and early warning in this context. The Council decided to enhance the role of the High Commissioner on National Minorities and to strengthen the Office of Democratic Institutions and Human Rights, for example in its ability to monitor elections.

I regret that the Council was unable to develop into principles on non-proliferation the commitment to indefinite extension of the Nuclear Non Proliferation Treaty agreed at Stockholm in December 1992.

The Secretary General has taken up his appointment as envisaged at the Stockholm Council meeting last year. The Rome Council established a permanent committee in Vienna under the Chairman in Office, to be supported by a unified Secretariat. These arrangements should enable the CSCE to fulfil more effectively its role in setting standards in human rights, resolving conflict, and providing early warning of possible crises. I hope that the CSCE will make an increasingly effective contribution to peace and stability in our region.

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of people employed, (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

Mr. Goodlad: As at 1 April 1993, the number of persons employed in each grade level (ie including equivalent grades) within the Department (including agencies) and the number of those who had classified themselves as being black people and as being Asian were:

	Total staff at grade level	Total classified as black people	Total classified as Asians
Grades 1-4	167	—	—
Grade 5	370	1	1
Grade 6	123	—	1
Grade 7	865	—	2
Senior executive officer	676	3	4
Higher executive officer	1,511	3	11
Executive officer	2,736	14	28
Adminstrative officer/ Administrative assistant	3,329	105	71
Industrial staff	63	1	2

These figures exclude staff who have classified themselves as being of other ethnic origin. There is no compulsion on staff to report their ethnic origin; the response rate for the staff in this answer is about 80 per cent.

European Terms

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice is given to officials about when to use the terms (a) European Union, (b) European Community and (c) European Economic Community.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs gave to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) on 2 December at column 680.

Saudi Arabia

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Saudi Arabian Government about delays in the payment of refunds of pension contributions to the Saudi Arabian General Organisation for Social Insurance due to British subjects.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Our embassy in Riyadh is in regular contact with the Saudi Arabian General Organisation for Social Insurance about payment of refunds to British subjects.

Committee of the Regions

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will consult with Welsh representative on the Committee of the Regions before he goes to the European Union summit in Brussels.

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will see the Welsh representatives at a meeting with all United Kingdom nominees to the Committee of the Regions on 8 December.

Tibet

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken to encourage dialogue between China and Tibet on the future of Tibet; and if he will make it his policy to ensure that the option of Tibetan independence is on the agenda of such dialogue.

Mr. Goodlad: We have consistently urged the Chinese authorities to begin talks, without pre-conditions, with the Tibetans, including the Dalai Lama, and to allow Tibetans greater autonomy. It is for the parties concerned to decide the agenda for such talks. Neither we nor our European partners believe that independence is a realistic option.

Kashmir

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the names and nationality of each member of a delegation of the International Commission of Jurists who visited Kashmir in August; if he will arrange for their report to be placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The members of the delegation from the International Commission of Jurists who visited Kashmir in August were Sir William Goodhart from the United Kingdom, Professor Vitit Muntarbhorn from Thailand, Dr. Dalmo Dallari from Brazil and Mrs. Florence Butegwa from Uganda. Their report is expected in January. As soon as a copy is available we will arrange for it to be placed in the Library.

Exports

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's policy regarding exports to (a) Israel, (b) Iran, (c) Iraq, (d) Syria, (e) Kuwait, (f) Saudi Arabia, (g) Jordan and (h) Egypt.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

Apart from Iraq, which is subject to a UN trade embargo and where special arrangements therefore apply, United Kingdom exporters are free, and indeed encouraged, to trade with the countries listed. However, goods covered by the Export of Goods Control Order 1992, as amended, are subject to various restrictions, which will vary from country to country.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many visits abroad the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Portillo: I made a visit to Mexico and Chile from 3-11 July. The purpose of the visit was to strengthen the United Kingdom's relations with the two countries, and to promote trade and investment: several British businessmen accompanied me. Two of the companies represented on the visit have since won major contracts. British Gas was awarded the investment distribution concession for the US$1·1 billion natural gas pipeline between Argentina and Chile. North West Water signed in September a £285 million 10-year contract with the Mexico City authorities for metering, billing and management services.

The cost attributable to my own participation in the visit, which was borne by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, was £5,526.

Taxation

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the proportion of gross domestic product paid in (a) income tax and (b) income tax plus value added tax, for each country in the European Union.

Mr. Nelson: International comparisons of income tax and VAT receipts are not readily available. However, figures for taxes on personal income and for taxes on general consumption as a share of GDP can be found in tables 10 and 28 of the 1993 edition of Revenue Statistics of OECD member countries, a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what date the United Kingdom is obliged under the terms of relevant European directives and other agreements to cease to zero-rate each of those categories of goods and services which benefit from such zero rating; what levels of value added tax within the United Kingdom would be able or obliged to apply to each of those different categories of goods and services after that date; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: The United Kingdom is not obliged under any EC directive or other agreement to cease current zero rates of VAT.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has to harmonise United Kingdom value added tax rates with those which pertain in other European countries; by what date; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: I have no proposals to harmonise value added tax rates in the United Kingdom with those charged in other European countries.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's long-term plans for the zero rating for value added tax purposes of the sale of new houses.

Sir John Cope: My right hon. and learned Friend said in his Budget statement that he had no proposals to make any changes to the VAT base.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if (a) VAT for goods and services currently zero rated and (b) VAT for goods and services currently exempt are included in his definition of the tax base.

Sir John Cope: No.

Private Health Insurance

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the tax yield in a full year of 3 per cent. tax on private health insurance premiums.

Sir John Cope [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Private health insurance premia are included within the accident and health category of insurance premia. The yield from tax at 3 per cent. on all insurance premia in this category is estimated to be about £100 million in 1995-96.

TRANSPORT

London Underground

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he will make funds available for London Underground to commence work on line renewal of the Northern line;

(2) when he will make funds available for London Underground to commence work on replacement of escalators at St. Paul's, Notting Hill Gate, Highgate and Marylebone stations;

(3) when he will make funds available for London Underground Ltd. to be able to commence work on the renewal of signalling systems on the Hammersmith, Circle and District lines.

Mr. Norris: London Transport's grant settlement for the three years to 1994-95 was announced on 30 November. Decisions on the timing of individual investment projects are for the management of London Transport and London Underground.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to authorise the construction of the North Greenwich station on the Jubilee line.

Mr. Norris: This will depend on completion of negotiations between London Underground Limited and British Gas on a financial contribution by British Gas to the costs involved.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from London Underground regarding projects considered essential for the delivery of a proper service to its customers.

Mr. Norris: I am regularly briefed by London Underground on many aspects of its investment programme.

Railways Regulator

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who will be the regulator for the railways industry; and when he will officially begin his duties.

Mr. MacGregor: I have appointed Mr. John Swift QC as rail regulator and international rail regulator. Parliamentary approval to new expenditure on administrative and other costs of the regulator will be sought in a new estimate to establish an Office of the Rail Regulator Vote (Class VI, Vote 8). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £500,000 will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

M25

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many written representations he has received about the proposed link roads alongside the M25 between junctions 12 and 16; and how many of these came from (a) residents of Staines and (b) other residents of the Spelthorne constituency.

Mr. Key: Some 4,250 individual letters have been received in response to public consultations on proposals for link roads between junctions 12 and 16 of the M25. Of these, 263 came from addresses in Staines and 114 from Ashford, Ashford Common, Laleham, Poyle, Shepperton, Stanwell, Stanwell Moor and Sunbury. In addition, some 8,500 pre-printed postcards were received during the consultations and other correspondence has been received subsequently but no statistics have been compiled about the origins of these.

Heathrow Report

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many written representations he has received about the proposals contained in the Heathrow and south-west quadrant orbital movements study—HASQUAD—report; and how many of these came from (a) residents of Sunbury on Thames and (b) other residents of the Spelthorne constituency.

Mr. Norris: To date some 1,700 written representations have been received, of which about 125 were from residents of Sunbury on Thames and about 30 were from other residents of the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to be in a position to decide on the future of the proposals contained in the Heathrow and south-west quadrant orbital movements study—HASQUAD—proposals.

Mr. Norris: I hope to make an announcement on the future of the HASQUAD study recommendations at the earliest opportunity, after I have been able to give careful consideration to all the comments received.

Railtrack

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what rate of return on (a) existing and (b) new investment he is asking Railtrack to achieve.

Mr. Freeman: We are currently discussing with Railtrack the setting of appropriate financial targets including the required rate of return on investment.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total value of assets transferring to the ownership of Railtrack on 1 April 1994.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail, in conjunction with Railtrack and its auditors, is presently working on the identification of the assets to be transferred to Railtrack, and the values to be ascribed to them.

River Thames

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department will promote the increased use of the River Thames for transporting London's waste to points of disposal.

Mr. Norris: The River Thames working group, which I chair, is examining the benefits and potential of maximising all types of traffic on the River Thames, including the transportation of waste. The working group is expected to produce and publish its recommendations next summer.

Quality Assurance Standards

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to ensure that when putting contracts out to tender his Department includes on the tender list companies which have acquired the BS5750 quality assurance standard.

Mr. Key: Most of my Department's contracts are placed with the road construction industry.

Several firms within the industry have already introduced recognised quality management schemes on a voluntary basis but the number to have done so is not yet sufficient to ensure proper competition if such schemes were mandatory.

For that reason it is not yet a departmental requirement that firms invited to tender for roadworks contracts must have such schemes in place.

However, my Department is working towards the gradual introduction of quality management requirements within the framework of BS5750. As a first step, we are proposing to introduce quality plans for individual contracts starting next year.

Nuclear Materials

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department received a request from the Campaign for Freedom of Information for information about the environmental aspects of transporting nuclear materials; when a reply was sent; and if he will make a statement on the time scale.

Mr. Key: A request was received by the Department on 30 September 1993 and acknowledged on 12 October. I expect that a full reply will be sent within the next five days.

British Summer Time

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by year since 1979 the number of children killed as a result of road traffic accidents (a) before attending school in the morning and (b) after school had ceased in the afternoon when clocks were set at (i) Greenwich mean time and (ii) British summer time.

Mr. Key: I regret that the information requested is not available. Road casualty statistics do not distinguish between school days and holidays.

Motorway Safety

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has as to the consequences of adding additional lanes to existing motorways for the risks of death and serious injury resulting from multiple or other types of accident.

Mr. Key: Available evidence from existing four-lane motorways in Britain does not suggest that accident rates are significantly different on them as compared with three-lane motorways. Motorways are widened to increase capacity and so relieve congestion. If this were not done more vehicles would be forced on to all-purpose roads where the accident rate is significantly higher.

Vehicle Inspectorate

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who is carrying out the current survey of staff attitudes at the Vehicle Inspectorate; and what is the cost.

Mr. Key: The current staff attitude survey is being conducted by Peratee Ltd. at a cost of £6,000 plus VAT. Peratee Ltd. are advising the Vehicle Inspectorate on the adoption of total quality management practice. The survey is part of a wider contract the total cost of which is £59,000 + VAT.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total number of staff employed at the Vehicle Inspectorate for each year since 1990.

Mr. Key: The average number of staff employed by the Vehicle Inspectorate in each of the last three financial years is as follows:

	Number
1990-91	1,653
1991-92	[1]1,879
1992-93	1,861

[1] This includes 255 staff from the Traffic Enforcement Organisation which was integrated into the inspectorate in April 1991.

Staff numbers are expressed as full-time equivalents.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total number of vehicles inspected by the Vehicle Inspectorate for each year since 1990.

Mr. Key: This data has been published in the VI Annual Report and Accounts for 1992-93, a copy of which has been deposited in the House of Commons Library. With the exception of five small schemes, the relevant data are summarised in the table.

Inspections	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total equipment budget for the Vehicle Inspectorate for each year since 1990.

Mr. Key: The budget for capital expenditure on equipment is summarised below. The budget covers the purchase of testing equipment such as roller brake testers, load simulators and smoke meters. The budget includes spare parts, but does not include staff and other costs involved in maintaining the equipment.

Year	Budget
1990-91	1,542,795
1991-92	1,911,100
1992-93	2,110,700

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated saving to the Exchequer of the repeal of the disabled passenger scheme for exemptions from vehicle excise duty.

Mr. Key: There were around 20,000 beneficiaries in the disabled passengers scheme at the date of repeal on 13 October 1993. These disabled people will continue to benefit from exemption from vehicle excise duty (VED) for as long as their disability remains. There were around 4,000 new applications per year at the time of repeal, so the estimated saving to the Exchequer is about £500,000 in the first year.

Trans-European Road Network

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of the final decision by the Council of Ministers on TERN.

Mr. Key: I have today placed in the House Libraries copies of the Council decision on the creation of a trans-European road network.

A41

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the growth in traffic on the A41 at Aston Clinton since the opening of the Berkhamsted-Kings Langley bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: None, but traffic counts indicate an additional 2,700 vehicles per day (average 16-hour weekday) an increase of 13·5 per cent. above figures taken before completion of Berkhamsted-Kings Langley bypass.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make a statement about the design standards proposed or applied to the various sections of the east-west route for which his Department has published proposals or which have already been opened to traffic;

(2) what plans he has to review his Department's traffic forecasts for the east-west route following the inclusion of the route in the trans-European road network; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether he plans to upgrade the design standards of all or any part of the east-west route following its inclusion in the trans-European road network; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 24 November at column 60. Inclusion in the TERN has no bearing on the standards or volume of traffic on the route.

Driver Identification Numbers

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State, if he will list the smallest number of separate identification numbers that a person with a driving licence can have; and how many persons are employed in the various Departments of state to administer these separate registers, stating the number employed in each case.

Mr. Key: For driving licence purposes the "driver number" is the only identification number required. It is automatically generated by computer when a driving licence is issued and requires no additional staff effort. There is no link between the driver number and any other identification number.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Sir John Wheeler: The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government Departments are stated in the Government IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method—CRAMM—and baseline security for IT systems—BSITS—risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the Government IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice; have been developed specifically for use within Government; and have been in operation for some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Sir John Wheeler: There is no sensitive document unit in the Northern Ireland Office or in any of the Northern Ireland Departments.

Mink Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many mink farms have operated in each county in Northern Ireland in each year since 1984; and how many there are at present.

Mr. Ancram: There has only ever been one licensed mink farm in Northern Ireland. It was situated in Co. Down and was in operation during the period from 1984 to 1991. There are no licensed mink farms in Northern Ireland at present.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds of each visit and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Sir Patrick Mayhew [holding answer 1 December 1993]: I have made six visits abroad in 1993, to 1 December. The available information requested is:

Date	Location	Purpose	[1]Travel

26–27 July 1993	Republic of Ireland	Speaking engagements	£3,515·40
11 November 1993	France	Wreath laying ceremony on behalf of Her Majesty's Government at the Somme	£1,360·00
		Total expenditure	£39,277·90

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Television Franchises

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if the changes of rules for television franchises will exempt Tyne Tees/Yorkshire because of his announced two-franchise limit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Yorkshire-Tyne Tees Holdings plc owns two companies, which each hold a regional ITV licence. If the Broadcasting (Restrictions on the Holding of Licences) (Amendment) Order 1993 is approved, the present limit on the holding of only two licences to provide regional ITV services would remain, although only one London licence could be held. If the holder of another ITV regional licence wanted to own Yorkshire-Tyne Tees Holdings, it would have to make arrangements to keep within the limit of two licences.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for NationalHeritage what plans he has to visit Liverpool to discuss the museums in the city; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I have no plans to visit Liverpool at the present time. Since taking office, however, I have visited both the Walker art gallery and the Liverpool museum, and have also been to the Lady Lever art gallery and the Tate gallery, Liverpool.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how often he has visited Liverpool since he was appointed.

Mr. Brooke: Twice.

Film Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information he has concerning the extent to which United Kingdom television producers are currently using facilities in the Republic of Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Successive Governments have refrained from interfering in questions of television programme content and production. This is a matter for the broadcasters concerned, so long as they act within the law.

PRIME MINISTER

Visits

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the official visits by himself and his predecessor to (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malaysia and (c) Singapore since June 1987; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

The Prime Minister: Official visits were made to Saudi Arabia in January 1991, March 1991 and January 1993; to Malaysia in August 1988, October 1989 (for CHOGM) and September 1993; and to Singapore in August 1988. The official visits made by my right hon. and noble Friend were a matter for her. Since November 1990 each of my visits to the countries concerned have been entirely for official purposes.

No. 10 Downing Street

Mr. Beith: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 30 November, Official Report, column 419, which charitable or other non-official organisations or groups have been notified that they may organise events at No. 10 Downing street under the financial arrangements described in his answer.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on 30 November 1993 at columns 418-19.

Ministers (Severance Pay)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister, if he will list those who have resigned, retired or been dismissed from ministerial office in the past 10 years and the severance pay in (i) cash and (ii) current prices paid to each one.

The Prime Minister: As the Financial Secretary explained on 28 October in his reply to a question from the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), the Parliamentary Pensions Act 1984 introduced severance payments for Ministers and other paid office holders in the House of Lords, subject to the conditions set out in the Act. The Ministerial and Other Pensions and Salaries Act 1991 extended the provision to Commons Ministers and other paid office holders in neither House.

Although no composite list is kept, we have identified from our records the following occasions on which severance payments have been authorised since 31 July 1984. In each case the severance payment would have been equal to three months of the relevant ministerial salary, as provided for by the Act.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Fire Doors

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee how many additional fire doors have been constructed (a) in the Palace of Westminster and (b) in the outbuildings in each of the last three years; what circumstances resulted in additional fire doors being built; what were the costs to the Exchequer; and how many additional fire doors are planned for the current year.

Mr. Ray Powell: This is a matter for the Director of Works and I will ask him to write to the hon. Member.

Beds (Staff)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee how many beds are available for use by House of Commons staff; what are the criteria for their use; if he will list the numbers of beds at each location; and what is the annual cost of laundry for staff beds.

Mr. Ray Powell: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms. I will ask him to write to the hon. Member.

Library (Asbestos)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what assessment was made of worker safety in respect of the return of staff to the Library in the summer recess while asbestos clearing work was being undertaken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ray Powell: The work to remove asbestos from the Library was carried out by a firm on the approved list for asbestos removal. It was undertaken in accordance with strict guidelines and procedures laid down by the Health and Safety Executive, on the basis of a professional assessment that there would be no danger to staff in the Library.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

LINK Programmes

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a table showing for each LINK programme (a) its year of commencement, (b) its total expenditure, (c) its expenditure in each year of operation, (d) the number of projects in each programme and (e) the planned expenditure for 1993-94.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

The table shows Government expenditure for each LINK programme. Figures given for 1993-94 are for the period April to September 1993; the whole year expenditure estimate is £30 million. Government expenditure on LINK programmes is at least matched by industry.

Recycling

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to encourage manufacturers to produce products which make use of recycled materials.

Mr. McLoughlin: In recent years, the main encouragement for manufacturers to use recycled materials in their products has come from customer demand, as members of the public take account of this environmental consideration when making their purchasing decisions. Many Government Departments have helped to encourage demand by themselves specifying recycled content in their purchases of stationery and other supplies. The Department of Trade and Industry is funding a number of projects aimed at identifying new end-uses for secondary raw materials, such as glass, plastics and rubber, and is addressing the issue of product standards to seek to remove any unnecessary discrimination against the use of recycled material.

Advice Centres

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total budget allocated by his Department during 1992-93 to (a) Business Advice Gateshead, (b) Business Advice Newcastle, (c) Business Advice North Tyneside, (d) Business Advice South Tyneside, (e) Entrust, Newcastle upon Tyne, (f) Gateshead Business Team, (g) Blaydon Business Centre, (h) Marketing Advice Centre, Newcastle and (i) Sunderland Business and Enterprise Centre.

Mr. Sainsbury: The figures are as follows:

(a) Nil;
(b) Nil;
(c) Nil:
(d) Nil;
(e) £218,538;
(f) Nil;
(g) Nil;
(h) Nil;
(i) Nil.

My Department was not the primary source of funding for these organisations in 1992-93. The training and enterprise councils (TECs) and local authorities provided core funding for the business advice centres and during this period my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Employment made provision for the TECs in her Estimates.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total budget allocated by his Department during 1992-93 to (a) the business advice centres in Cleveland, Cumbria, Northumberland and Tyne and Wear and (b) the eight enterprise agencies in County Durham.

Mr. Sainsbury: The figures are as follows:

(a) £105,778
(b) £21,350

My Department was not the primary source of funding for these organisations in 1992-93. The training and enterprise councils (TECS) and local authorities provided core funding for the regional business advice centres and the enterprise agencies operating in County Durham. During this period my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Employment made provision for the TECs in her Estimates.

Development Agencies

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the budget allocated by his Department during 1992-93 to (a) the Derwentside Industrial development agency, (b) the Shildon and Sedgefield development agency, (c) the East Durham Development Company, (d) the County Durham development agency, (e) the Northern Development Company Ltd., (f) the Teesside development corporation, (g) the Tyne and Wear development corporation, (h) the Tyne and Wear Development Company Ltd. and (i) the West Cumbria development agency.

Mr. Sainsbury: The figures are as follows:

(a) nil
(b) nil
(c) £59,855
(d) nil
(e) £1,723,500
(f) nil
(g) nil
(h) nil
(i) nil

My Department is not the primary source of funding for these organisations. The regional and sub-regional development agencies listed are funded through a combination of local authority and, in some cases, private sector contributions. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment makes provision for the urban development corporations in his Estimates.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. McLoughlin: Invitations to tender issued by the Department for information technology goods and services include details of any relevant IT security requirements with which the supplier must comply. Those requirements are developed in accordance with cental Government IT security standards and best practice. One factor for consideration can be security within the supplier's own environment. The Department has welcomed the code of practice for information security management as a practical guide to effective information security management and, where a supplier has adopted and implemented the code, this will be evidence that security is taken seriously.

Konver Programme

Mr. Pike: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many local authorities have submitted bids under the Konver programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Fifty-eight.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the allocations under the Konver programme to the United Kingdom and France; if he will make representations to ensure that the United Kingdom obtains a fairer proportion of EC defence diversification moneys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Government expressed concern to the European Commission in May and June 1993 about the latter's method of allocation of 1993 Konver grant. The Commission acknowledged that the method and data used were imperfect. In any future Konver initiative the Commission would take account of data provided by the Government.

Scottish Calibration Centre

Mr. McKelvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total revenue raised from auction sale of equipment of the Scottish calibration centre.

Mr. McLoughlin: The recent auction of equipment at NEL was not confined solely to the sales equipment from the Scottish Calibration Centre which was closed in September, it involved the disposal of equipment which had become surplus to a wide range of National Engineering Laboratory activities. The total net proceeds from the sale at auction was £180,725 of which £91,850 represented the sale of equipment which had formerly been used in the Scottish calibration centre.

Car Boot Sales

Mr. French: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the annual turnover of car boot sales in the United Kingdom.

Mr. McLoughlin: No information is available on the turnover of car boot sales in the United Kingdom.

Consultants

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what contracts for technical and technological advice and research have been placed with external consultants since 1 April 1992; what was the total cost; and which such research was commissioned from agencies outside the United Kingdom.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department does not classify consultancy contracts in terms of their activity or the contractors country of origin, and the information requested cannot be provided other than at disproportionate cost.

National Engineering Laboratory

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which sections, teams or project groups have been named for closure at the National Engineering Laboratory since 1 April.

Mr. McLoughlin: The only section team or project group which has been named for closure or closed at NEL since 1 April 1993 was the Scottish calibration centre which was closed on 30 September. The Scottish calibration centre was not a core activity of NEL and employed five staff, two of whom were in scientific grades.

Exports

Mr. Purchase: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what further proposals he has to assist small and medium-sized firms in their export efforts.

Mr. Needham: My Department, jointly with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, provides a wide range of high quality advice and support to United Kingdom exporters, 75 per cent. of our export services are taken by small to medium-sized companies and I plan to increase their awareness and access to these through the establishment of 200 business links throughout England. With DTI support, business links bring together local business support providers—TECs, chambers of commerce, local authorities and local enterprise agencies—in partnerships to meet the needs, including exporting needs, of small and medium sized companies in their area. Additional export help is targetted at small to medium sized companies that are passive or less experienced exporters through 17 export development advisers supported by DTI, based in chambers of commerce throughout the country.

Gas and Electricity

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the relationship between the powers of the Director General of Gas Supply and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission with regard to the setting of the capping price for gas.

Mr. Eggar: Section 24 of the Gas Act 1986 enables the Director General of Gas Supply to refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the question whether any matter relating to the supply of gas by a public gas supplier to tariff customers, including the tariff formula, may operate or be expected to operate against the public interest. If the Monopolies and Mergers Commission finds that the matter operates or may be expected to operate against the public interest, the Director General is required under section 26 of the Gas Act to modify such conditions of the public gas supplier's authorisation as appears to her to be requisite to remedy or prevent the adverse effects found by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the mechanism which he uses to ensure that the disconnection regulators of gas and electricity use their discretion in ways consonant with national energy policy.

Mr. Eggar: Under the Gas Act 1986 and the Electricity Act 1989 the Director General of Gas Supply and the Director General of Electricity Supply each has a duty to protect the interests of consumers. Domestic electricity and gas disconnections are now the lowest on record.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Dafis To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the proposed timetable for decommissioning THORP.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 2 December 1993 at column 736.

Insolvency Service

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on possible private sector involvement in the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: A recent review by Stoy Hayward Consulting examined the work of the Insolvency Service and its official receivers and looked at the scope for involving the private sector to a larger extent in their mechanical, processing tasks. I am currently considering what further work needs to be done and shall announce to the House in due course what the next steps will be.

Plugs and Sockets

Mr. David Porter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the harmonisation of plug and socket installations to a common European standard; if the European unfused electrical plug is under consideration; what steps will be taken to avoid confusion by the public over differing safety standards; and who is to bear the costs of changing plugs and sockets in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sainsbury: No decision has been taken to change the standard for plugs and sockets in the United Kingdom. Although the plug standards which are currently under discussion in CENELEC, the body responsible for electrical standards in Europe, do not incorporate a fuse, there are other means of providing an equivalent level of protection. My Department has commissioned an independent analysis of the costs and benefits for the United Kingdom, and the results of this study will be published in the new year. In assessing whether any change to our present standards might be desirable at some future date full account will be taken both of consumer safety issues and of the cost implications for consumers and industry.

Wearmouth Pit

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many British Coal employees at the Wearmouth pit on 26 November (a) work on surface and (b) work below ground; and what is the average annual wage, including shift allowance, of employees in each category.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for British Coal.

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the names of all contractors' companies operating at Wearmouth pit, the number of employees of each individual contractor at the pit and that number as a percentage of the total British Coal work force at Wearmouth pit; and what is the average length of employment contract issued by individual contracting companies at Wearmouth pit.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for British Coal.

Quality Assurance Standards

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he has taken to ensure that when putting contracts out to tender his Department includes on the tender list companies which have acquired the BS5750 quality assurance standard.

Mr. Eggar: Our buyers are encouraged to include on tender lists companies certificated to BS5750 or its equivalent wherever possible.

Government-funded Research

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a table updating the information and showing the changes from table 3.19.1 of the "Annual Review of Government Funded Research" in the light of the recent public expenditure statement.

Mr. Eggar: Revised figures for the Department of Trade and Industry's expenditure on Research and Development will be prepared in light of this year's Public Expenditure Survey and published in the 1994 Forward Look of Science and Technology (which replaces the Annual Review of Government Funded Research and Development).

Waste Paper

Mr. Cryer: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the effect of the level of paper waste prices in Germany on United Kingdom waste paper resources.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 3 December 1993]: The Government are keenly aware of the problems being experienced by the United Kingdom waste paper industry as a result of the German packaging ordinance and the DSD collection scheme. We have raised our concerns bilaterally with the German Government, and at EC level. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, has also written to EC Commissioners, encouraging them to come to an early conclusion on their consideration of the German system's compatibility with EC law.

My hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside, recently attended a meeting of EC Environment Ministers, called by the German Minister, to discuss the effects of trade flows of secondary raw materials, including paper. The German Government referred there to the expectation that some 800,000 tonnes of waste paper recycling capacity would come on stream in Germany by the end of 1994; they have suggested that the quantity of waste paper exported for recycling will diminish substantially as a consequence. In our view, however, this does not address the fundamental cause of the problem, which is the statutory requirement in Germany to recover and recycle far more waste material than there is demand for.

The announcement on producer responsibility which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment and I made in July was intended partly as a response to the difficulties caused by over-collection of some materials under the German DSD scheme. It is intended to provide that United Kingdom collectors and reprocessors are put on a similar basis to their competitors in Germany, and in other EC countries.

For the longer term, we believe that distortions of the kind currently being experienced are best dealt with by setting an overall framework through Community-wide legislation, such as the proposed EC Packaging and Packaging Waste Directive.

Patenting of Human Genes

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on his Department's policy towards the European Commission's proposal to ban the patenting of human genes.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 2 December 1993]: My Department supports the proposal contained in the European Commission's draft Directive on the Legal Protection of Biotechnological Inventions that the human body and parts of the body should not be patentable. Whilst this would exclude genes in the body from patentability, we do accept that it may be appropriate for sequences of nucleotides of specific industrial application, which may derive from human genes, to be patentable provided the normal criteria of novelty and inventive step are met.

Plutonium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any plutonium has been exported to the United States of America since 1990 under the 1959 amendment to the 1958 United Kingdom-United States mutual atomic energy exchange agreement.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 3 December 1993]: No exports of civil plutonium have been made to the United States since 1990 under the 1958 defence agreement between that country and the United Kingdom. Exports of other plutonium are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Levitt Group

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he now has to appoint inspectors to investigate the activities of Roger Levitt and the collapse of the Levitt group of companies.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 3 December 1993]: The Serious Fraud Office has conducted extensive inquiries into the activities of Mr. Levitt and the Levitt Group. No useful purpose would be served by my Department duplicating these inquiries into the activities of the undischarged bankrupt Roger Levitt and the companies formerly under his control.

Jetstream

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what meetings or correspondence his Department has had with the European Commission or other officials of multinational organisations about the effect of unfair competition on Jetstream;

(2) what representations he has received alleging unfair support to aircraft manufacturers overseas which are in direct competition with Jetstream; what action he has taken; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what visits Ministers or officers of his Department have made or plan to make to the British Aerospace Jetstream plant at Prestwick.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answers 6 December 1993]: My Department has had no contact with the European Commission or other multinational organisations about the effect of unfair competition on Jetstream.

There have been a number of representations from Jetstream alleging unfair support to aircraft manufacturers overseas. We have asked the company for specific details of the evidence they have on these allegations, and have offered to meet them to discuss what remedies are available under international mechanisms.

Four officials from my Department's aerospace division visited the British Aerospace Jetstream plant at Prestwick in the last year. The recently appointed head of the division is to visit Prestwick in early December.

EDUCATION

Schools (Inspectors Reports)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on the inspector's report naming Dick Sheppard school and Lilian Baylis school as schools as giving cause for concern and serious concern.

Mr. Robin Squire: Both schools will be inspected in the current academic year under the new inspection arrangements introduced following the Education (Schools) Act 1992. Lilian Baylis school will be inspected in the spring term and Dick Sheppard school in the summer term.

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of people employed, (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

Mr. Boswell: We do not hold information on the ethnic origin of all our staff but of those who have responded to the ethnic monitoring survey (98 per cent.) carried out last year, the figures at 1 December 1993 are as follows:

Grade 6	17	0	0	0
Grade 7	154	1	1	2
SEO and equivalent	111	0	0	1
HEO and equivalent	357	6	2	1
EO and equivalent	478	23	12	3
AO and equivalent	600	52	23	5
AA and equivalent	360	14	6	0
TOTAL	2,142	96	44	12

These figures reflect the number of staff in post and include 360 staff in the Teachers Pensions Agency.

Universities

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what new steps he is considering to enable universities to play a more active role in the development of Britain's manufacturing capacity.

Mr. Boswell: Universities are already contributing significantly to the development of our manufacturing capacity, both through the supply of highly qualified people and through collaborative research and other services. My right hon. Friend has encouraged scientific and technological education in universities through a differential tuition fee structure. He has also recently announced a bursary scheme to encourage particularly able students to enter engineering courses.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps he is taking to enable university personnel greater freedom to undertake outside consultancy work.

Mr. Boswell: It is for universities as employers to determine the conditions of employment of their staff, including arrangements for consultancy work. The Government have no locus in this matter.

Students

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment he has made of the trends in students entering higher education from (a) different social classes and (b) differential parental income brackets since the introduction of student loans.

Mr. Boswell: Details of the socio-economic background of accepted applicants to higher education have been collected and published by both the higher education admissions agencies since 1991. Details of the number of mandatory award holders in relation to the residual income of their parents are collected and published by the Department in the Statistics of Education Students Awards Volume. The 1993 student income and expenditure survey, the results of which are due to be published shortly, also sought information about the socio-economic background of those interviewed.

Although it is too early to identify any significant trends, the evidence so far indicates that the introduction of loans has had no adverse effect on participation by students from less well-off families.

School Performance

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what arrangements his Department has for taking into account when judging school performance the range of intake to a particular school and other relevant factors.

Mr. Robin Squire: Ofsted is responsible for advising my right hon. Friend on the quality of education and standards achieved in schools. I have asked Professor Sutherland, Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools, to send the hon. Member a copy of his published Framework of Inspection which sets out the criteria for judging school performance. Work on operational approaches to value added in the context of school performance tables is being taken forward by the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority.

Local Government Review

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what consultation has taken place with teacher trade unions, about their employment conditions in the light of the local government review.

Mr. Robin Squire: The teacher trade unions have sought no such consultations with my right hon. Friend. None has taken place.

Swimming Instruction

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what surveys he has recently conducted via local education authorities of the percentage of pupils receiving swimming instruction; what assessment he has made of any change there has been in that percentage over the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department carried out two surveys at the end of 1991 to inform decisions on the feasibility of making swimming a statutory requirement of national curriculum physical education. One was to determine the number of schools with swimming pools; the other to find out how many of a representative sample of over 1,200 schools, with or without their own pools, made provision of some kind for swimming lessons. Copies of the findings of these surveys were placed in the Library. Neither, however, yielded information on the number or proportion of schools pupils receiving swimming instruction.

Free School Meals

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list, by education authority area, the number of pupils in receipt of (a) free school meals and (b) clothing grants for each year since 1987; and if he will indicate, in each case, what percentage this represents of the total number of pupils in each area.

Mr. Forth: The information requested on take-up of free school meals in January 1992—the latest date for which information is available—is shown in the table. Similar information for January 1989 and subsequent years is published annually in the Statistics of Education (Schools) Volumes, copies of which are available in the Library. Information prior to 1989 is not available on a comparable basis although the results of early school meals censuses were published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy up to 1988 in "—School Meal Statistics at October " copies of which are available in the Library.

Information on the number of pupils in receipt of clothing grants is not collected centrally.

Pupil Testing

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has for including the testing of trigonometry at key stage 4; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: From 1994, trigonometry will be examined at key stage 4 through GCSEs prepared to meet national curriculum requirements in mathematics. In a recent report on this year's GCSE, the Office for Standards in Education identified trigonometry as an area of mathematics where there were often high standards of achievement among candidates.

Schools Capital Programme

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what discussions he has held with his colleagues regarding increasing the capital programme for schools.

Mr. Forth: Decisions on central Government capital provision for schools were taken as part of the overall discussions within this year's public expenditure survey.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will consider increasing Coventry education department's capital programme for schools.

Mr. Forth: Capital bids for 1994-95 from all local education authorities are currently under consideration. My right hon. Friend expects to announce annual capital guidelines and voluntary-aided school capital allocations to all authorities, including Coventry, later this month.

Teacher Training

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what proposals he has for improving teacher training; and when they will be implemented.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend has set out new standards for initial training which define the knowledge and skills new teachers require. Student teachers must spend more time in schools, and schools will be able to play a full part in designing and running courses. Training for primary teachers must include more time on the core subjects. Courses are already being adjusted—all secondary courses must meet the new criteria by September 1994, all primary courses by September 1996. My right hon. Friend has also made arrangements to allow groups of schools to run their own courses. The first started this September, and more will start next year.

The Education Bill recently introduced in another place provides for a Teacher Training Agency to underpin these reforms. Subject to the passage of the legislation, the agency will be established in September 1994. It will fund teacher training and related courses; accredit institutions offering initial teacher training; and act as a central focus of information and advice about teaching as a career.

Play Groups

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what additional resources he intends to provide for improving facilities for pre-school play groups.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department for Education is this year making available a grant of £887,000 to the national Pre-School Playgroups Association to improve the education content of playgroup provision by supporting a number of training posts. This compares with a grant of £649,500 in 1992-93. Financial support is also provided by the Department of Health and the Ministry of Defence. Grant to the association for 1994-95 is currently under consideration. Individual playgroups are self-financing and receive most of their income from fees charged to parents, grants from local authorities, and local fund-raising.

Education Welfare Officers

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many education welfare officers were employed (a) in 1979 and (b) for the latest year for which information is available; and if he will break the figure down by individual local education authority.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is not centrally available.

Discretionary Awards

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when he expects the findings of the current national survey of local education authority discretionary award provision to be published.

Mr. Boswell: This survey was commissioned by the Calouste Gulbenkian and Sir John Cass Foundations, with the support of my Department and the Further Education Funding Council, and is being conducted by the National Foundation for Educational Research. Accordingly, publication of the survey's findings is not in the Government's hands. I understand that by the middle of November only half of the local education authorities in England and Wales had been able to return the second of the two questionnaires sent to them in May. I very much hope that the remaining authorities will be able to make their returns by the end of December. The survey's steering committee, on which my Department is represented, now expects the findings to be published as a Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation document at the end of March.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Criminal Justice Act 1992

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what expenditure was incurred in the implementation of the Criminal Justice Act 1992, including the cost of training of lay magistrates; and what was the cost of implementing the subsequent amending legislation to the Act.

Mr. Maclean: The Criminal Justice Act 1991 contained a wide range of provisions including the introduction of a framework for sentencing, new early release arrangements and provisions relating, among other things, to children's evidence, prisoner escorts and cash limits for magistrates courts. A number of Government Departments and other agencies were involved in implementing the Act. Information about the expenditure which they may have incurred specifically in relation to implementing provisions of the Act is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The training of lay magistrates is carried out by courts locally, and training about the provisions of the 1991 Act was effected within overall training budgets. It is not possible to disaggregate the costs of this training. For similar reasons, it is not possible to identify the cost of implementing the amendments made to the sentencing framework of the 1991 Act by the Criminal Justice Act 1993.

Crime, Northumberland

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he proposes to tackle youth crime in Blyth Valley and in south-east Northumberland.

Mr. Maclean: My Department is already supporting in different ways a range of local action which has a reduction of the opportunity for, and prevalence of, crime by young people among its objectives. Thus, the local probation service is involved in a number of multi-agency initiatives. An activity project has been set up for more constructive use of leisure time and programmes are being developed to increase training and employment opportunities.

In addition, the Home Office funded Drugs Prevention Newcastle, in collaboration with the Northumbria Coalition Against Crime has produced "Dialogue on Drugs", an educational resource pack on good practice for drugs education which is being disseminated through Education Departments in Northumberland and Tyne and Wear.

The Government announced on 2 March 1993 further measures to tackle youth crime throughout England and Wales ranging from improving discipline in schools to giving courts a new sentence of detention, the secure training order, for persistent juvenile offenders.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what percentage of offenders appearing before the courts in south-east Northumberland were unemployed in each year since 1989;

(2) what percentage of offenders in Blyth Valley and south-east Northumberland were aged under 21 years in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Maclean: Information is not collected centrally on the employment status of defendants appearing before the courts.

The table shows the number and percentage of offenders by age convicted at Blyth Valley, Morpeth and Wansbeck petty sessional divisions and at the Crown court who were committed by the above mentioned three courts for 1992. 1993 data will not be available until autumn 1994. From 1 April 1993 the three courts combine to form the south-east Northumberland petty sessional division.

Note:—From 1 April 1993 Blyth Valley, Morpeth and Wansbeck PSD combine to form the South East Northumberland PSD.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new strategies he intends to promote to tackle drug problems in Blyth Valley and in south-east Northumberland.

Mr. Maclean: The Government's overall strategy for tackling drug misuse is aimed at reducing both the supply of and demand for drugs throughout the United Kingdom. Through the local drugs prevention teams we are developing imaginative strategies specifically designed to tackle local drug problems in key areas. Initiatives planned by the team in Newcastle include the launch of a drugs information line and publication of information packs for both young people and parents which will also benefit those living in Blyth Valley and south-east Northumberland.

Obscenity and Violence

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many representations he has received over the last six months on videos available to children and containing pornographic material and scenes of violence; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what recent representations he has received on reform of the laws relating to obscenity; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: We have received a number of representations from hon. Members and others about the availability of pornographic and violent videos, and also about the law relating to obscenity in general. We have made clear our determination to act firmly against those who trade in obscene material, especially those engaged in the deplorable traffic in child pornography. We intend shortly to invite this House to approve legislation which will make child pornography offences under the Protection of Children Act 1978 and offences under the Obscene Publications Act 1959 serious arrestable offences—thereby giving the police increased powers of search and seizure as well as assisting them to break up child pornography rings by arresting those involved. We propose to extend existing legislation so that it will cover simulated child pornography manufactured on computer and to make other important changes to the law as it affects computer pornography. We will also be proposing that courts should have a power of imprisonment for those convicted of possessing child pornography and that the validity of search warrants under the Protection of Children Act should be extended from 14 to 28 days. In addition we propose to extend the powers of local authority trading standards officers and magistrates' courts to enforce the Video Recordings Act 1984.

Our controls on obscene materials and, in particular, on video recordings are already the toughest in Europe, and we will continue to seek suitable ways in which they might be further strengthened. Nevertheless, the final responsibility for what children watch inevitably rests in the home, and it is important that all parents and guardians should ensure that their children are not exposed to unsuitable material.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consideration he has given to appointing a body other than the British Board of Film Classification to undertake statutory responsibility of the classification system under the Video Recordings Act 1984;

(2) when was the last time he met members of the British Board of Film Classification to discuss the operation of the Video Recordings Act 1984;

(3) if he will publish the details of the research project being carried out by the British Board of Film Classification into the impact of violent videos on children; and when he expects to receive a copy of the report.

Mr. Maclean: The Government keep the arrangements for the control of video recordings under constant review, but we have no plans to designate any other persons to undertake the classification of video works currently carried out by the British Board of Film Classification. We believe that the BBFC fulfils its role conscientiously. My officials maintain frequent contact with them. I met Lord Birkett, a Vice-President of the BBFC, to discuss the operation of the Video Recordings Act 1984 earlier this year.

The BBFC, together with the BBC, the ITC and the Broadcasting Standards Council, commissioned research into the viewing habits of young offenders and other children of comparable age. It will be for the sponsor bodies to arrange publication of the results of this research; but I understand that this is likely to be early next year.

North Wales Police

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cautions were administered by the North Wales police for driving-related offences in each year since 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The available information relates to written warnings for alleged motoring offences and is as follows:

Written warnings for motoring offences in north Wales

Year	Number
1990	3,655
1991	3,781
1992	[1]3,326

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Howard: There are at present 28 members of the information officer class employed as press and publicity officers in the Department's public relations branch. In addition, there are seven information officer grades similarly employed in the Prison Service and one in the national criminal intelligence service.

Precise information for 1985 and 1979 is not readily available, but comparable totals for the Department in those years are believed to be 27 and 24.

Right of Silence

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received on the abolition of the right of silence in a criminal court; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Since the report of the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice was published, we have received 13 letters from right hon. and hon. Members on this issue and 51 letters direct from members of the public and organisations.

Home Affairs Council

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of EC Home Affairs Ministers on 29 and 30 November.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The meeting on 29 and 30 November was the first Interior and Justice Council held under the provisions of the treaty on European union. The main points dealt with were as follows.

The Council agreed, for submission to the European Council on 10 and 11 December, action plans and work programmes for the areas for which under Title VI of the Treaty it is responsible.

The Council took note of the progress made on implementing the work programme on immigration and asylum adopted at Maastricht, and agreed subject to a Spanish reserve a number of matters related to asylum and the practical application of the Dublin convention. It agreed not to seek to transfer competence on the right of asylum to the Community but decided to review the matter before the end of 1995.

The Council considered a report on racism and xenophobia and agreed a resolution concerning concrete measures to combat this phenomenon.

The Commission gave a presentation on its proposals for Community legislation under Article 100C providing for a list of third countries whose nationals would require a visa to enter member states, and for an amendment of the draft external frontiers convention. The Council agreed that these proposals should be given further consideration when they were received.

The Council agreed broad principles to be observed in drawing up readmission agreements with third countries and will consider at a future meeting the question of the inclusion of a commitment to such agreements in Community co-operation agreements.

The Council considered means of extending cooperation with certain third countries on Title VI matters. It will examine proposals at its next meeting.

The Council noted an interim report on the work being carried out in the field of extradition and instructed officials to produce a final report by the end of 1994.

The Council considered a report by the Presidency on possible Community accession to the European convention on human rights and decided to consult the European Court of Justice about the legal consequences. The United Kingdom expressed strong reservations about the need for this at this stage, given the absence of consensus on the desirability of accession.

The Council noted preparatory work by the Europol drugs unit and progress on the Europol convention. It received a report commissioned by Ministers at Kolding in May 1993 on international organised crime and approved the action programme contained in it.

The Council discussed the internal and external terrorist threat to member states and decided to examine ways to improve co-operation between member states on counter-terrorism.

The Council adopted recommendations and resolutions on the campaign against money laundering; on protection of the financial interests of the Community; on the exchange of information on environmental crime; and on the responsibilities of organisers of sports events.

It also agreed five recommendations aimed at combating trade in human beings for prostitution.

I am placing in the Library of the House the press communique issued following the meeting, and other documents approved by the Council.

Wormwood Scrubs Prison

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each of the projects now under development at Wormwood Scrubs prison, the cost of each project and if funding for each project has been approved and granted.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. D. Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 6 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your further Question about the current development work at Wormwood Scrubs prison.

My letter of 30 November 1993 in reply to your earlier Question about the current development work at the prison explained the work being carried out at the prison and the work planned for the future (published in Hansard on 1 December 1993 col 625). In the final paragraph of my letter I said that a final decision had still to be made about the timing and phasing of proposals to complete the modernisation of the four existing accommodation wings.

Although a precise timetable has still to be determined we are currently planning to start the modernisation of A and B wings in the Autumn of 1994. The work is expected to take two years. Further modernisation work to C and D wings will be carried out after work to A and B wings has been completed. It is too early to give an indication of the likely timing of this work, which will depend on resources available in future years and priorities across the Prison Service estate.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the prison population roll at Wormwood Scrubs prison on Monday 15 November.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. D. Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 6 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the prison population roll at Wormwood Scrubs.

On Monday 15 November 1993 there were 829 prisoners in Wormwood Scrubs.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in detail the actions that his Department have taken at Wormwood Scrubs prison following the report of Mr. Justice Tumim.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 6 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the action taken by the Prison Service at Wormwood Scrubs prison following the report of His Honour Judge Tumim.

Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons made an unannounced short inspection of Wormwood Scrubs prison from 18 to 20 August 1993. The report was submitted to the Secretary of State on 22 November, and it is currently being considered.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the days of the week on which the photographs in the White Paper "Sunday Trading—A Guide to the Options for Reform", Cm 2300, were taken.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We do not know on which day of the week most of the photographs were taken as this is for the most part irrelevant. For example, we do not know on what day of the week the photograph on page 1 of the guide —the 1950s street scene—was taken. But, where a photograph is used clearly to illustrate a specific Sunday activity, the photograph was taken on a Sunday, for example, the photograph of Sunday shopping in Edinburgh on page 5 of the guide.

Sensitive Documents Unit

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Howard: The Home Office does not have a sensitive documents unit.

Prisoners (Attacks)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, with reference to the subject of attacks on prisoners, he will make it his policy to ensure that the same information is available on both privately and publicly managed prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information on assaults on inmates in each Prison Service establishment is published in "Statistics of offences against prison discipline and punishments England and Wales 1992", Cm 2411. A copy is available in the Library of the House.

New Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much new money is to be made available for the building of the proposed new prisons in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. D. Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 6 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about how much money is to be made available for the building of the proposed new prisons in England and Wales.

I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his earlier Question on 1 December 1993 (columns 627-28).

Public Order

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the 1992 figures for prosecutions and convictions under (a) the Public Order Act 1936 and (b) sections 17 to 23 of the Public Order Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Court proceedings data for 1992 became available on 3 December 1993 following publication of the Command Paper "Criminal Statistics England and Wales 1992" Cm 2410. Copies of the Command Paper and its four supplementary volumes are available from the Library. Requests for information regarding specific sections of the Public Order Act 1936 can be made direct to room 1824B, S1 division, research and statistics department, Home Office, Lunar house, Wellesley road, Croydon, CR0 9YD.

I will write to the hon. Member regarding sections 17 to 23 of the Public Order Act 1986.

Identity Cards

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his latest estimate of the costs of introducing a national identity card scheme.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The costs of an identity card scheme would depend on the administrative details of the scheme and the checks required before an identity card was issued.

In 1989, it was estimated, on the basis of the costs of issuing passports, that the cost of introducing a national identity card scheme would be in the region of £350 million, excluding initial capital costs. Annual running costs were estimated to be between £50 million and £100 million. These figures were based on the unit cost of a passport—then £7·50—and assumed a scheme in which identity cards are issued to all British citizens aged 12 and over. The figures were published on 6 February 1989 at column 468 and on 10 May 1993 at column 340.

In 1991-92, the unit cost of a passport was £10·15. At this cost, the 1989 estimate of the costs of introducing a national identity card scheme would increase to about £475 million.

James Bulger

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the parents of James Bulger will be informed of what custodial tariff is to be applied to Jon Venables and Robert Thompson.

Mr. Howard: I have not yet decided the period of custody to be served for retribution and deterrence in these cases. When I have, I will consider what information might be given to the parents of James Bulger, and how that might best be done. In considering what information they might receive I will of course wish to take their own views fully in to account.

The arrangements for determining the period of custody which those convicted of murder are required to serve in order to satisfy the requirements for retribution and deterrence are set out in my replies of 27 July 1993 at columns 863-65, and 4 November 1993 at columns 376-78, to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence).

Deportation Notices

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide figures for the number of notices of intention to deport issued since the coming into force of the Immigration Act 1988.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is given in the table.

Notices of intention to deport issued

Year	Number
1988 August to December	1,117
1989	3,213
1990	3,001
1991	3,440
1992	3,594
1993 January to September	[1]3,309

Emergency Warning System

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to the need for a nationally co-ordinated emergency warning system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: After a review of the civil defence arrangements in the United Kingdom, it was announced on 12 November 1992 that the obsolescent national siren warning system was to be closed down and that future national arrangements for warning the public should be based on the use of radio and television broadcasts. Work is in hand for the new system.

Citizenship Applications

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of applications for British citizenship outstanding at the latest available date; what was the corresponding figure at the same time in each of the last five years; what is the average time currently between the receipt of a British citizenship application and a decision being taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: On 30 November 1993, the number of recorded outstanding applications for British citizenship was 39,638. The numbers of recorded applications outstanding at the end of November in each of the previous five years were as follows:

	Number
November 1988	114,152
November 1989	125,407
November 1990	88,671
November 1991	52,713
November 1992	49,945

During November the average waiting time between the receipt of an application and a certificate being issued was 17 months for certificates of naturalisation and 13 months for certificates of registration. The latter figure includes those certificates issued to minors whose applications were submitted at the same time as their parents' application for naturalisation.

Special Constabulary

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has issued to chief constables concerning explanations being given to those refused recruitment to the special constabulary; what right of review or appeal exists to applicants refused admission to the special constabulary; what is the time limit on a fresh application to join the special constabulary being made by a person refused admission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The way individual applications for special constables are dealt with and processed in each force is a matter for the chief constable concerned. No guidance on any of the points raised has been given to chief constables by the Home Office.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations from individuals and organisations he has received concerning the policy of the Yorkshire police in respect of giving reasons when a person is refused admission to the special constabulary.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No such representations have been received.

Child Deportees

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what steps his Department takes to ensure that when deporting children article 3 of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child is upheld;

(2) how many children have been deported by his Department in the last year for which figures are available;

(3) what steps his Department is taking to ensure that when deporting children article 16 of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child is upheld;

(4) what steps his Department is taking to ensure that when deporting children article 24 of the UN convention on the rights of the child is upheld;

(5) what steps his Department is taking to ensure that when deporting children article 6 of the UN convention on the rights of the child is adhered to;

(6) what steps his Department is taking to ensure that when deporting children article 12 of the UN convention on the rights of the child is upheld.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No child under the age of 18 has been deported in the last year. In ratifying the United Nations convention on the rights of the child, the United Kingdom reserved the right to apply such immigration legislation as it deemed necessary from time to time.

In carrying out any deportation involving children, account is taken of the articles of the convention to which the hon. Member has drawn attention.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what immunisations his Department arranged for Nkechi Nwokedi to receive before she was deported to Nigeria with her mother on 9 July;

(2) what steps his Department takes to ensure that children deported with their parents receive the appropriate immunisations to protect their health in the country to which they are deported.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None. Nkechi Nwokedi was not deported. She accompanied her mother who was returned to Nigeria on 9 July as the subject of a deportation order. We understand that there is currently no requirement for people travelling to Nigeria to be immunised. However, Ms Nwokedi had been aware for some time of the intention to deport her and it would have been open to her to make arrangements for her child to be immunised, if she thought this desirable.

More generally, arrangements are made for immunisation to be provided, as appropriate, for any deportee who requests it, and would be extended on request to a child accompanying a deportee.

International Sikh Youth Federation

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library the material which he has supplied to the courts regarding the aims and methods of the United Kingdom branch of the International Sikh Youth Federation.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Secretary of State has not supplied any such material to the courts.

Immigration Complaints Audit Committee

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the membership of the immigration and nationality department complaints audit committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I announced in reply to a question from my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) on 31 March at column 226 that my right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State intended to appoint a Complaints Audit Committee for the Immigration and Nationality Department—IND. My right hon. and learned Friend has appointed Miss Diana Rookledge as chairman and Mr. Blair Greaves and Mr. Karamjit Singh to be members of the committee. The committee will start work at the beginning of the new year.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce ethnic monitoring throughout the criminal justice system.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 23 December 1993]: Ethnic monitoring of stop and search by the police was introduced nationally in April 1993. On present plans I anticipate that by 1995 the police will also be in position to monitor arrests and cautions. Our ultimate intention is to extend monitoring throughout the criminal justice system, but at present it would be premature to forecast when that goal will be achieved.

Drugs Offences

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arrests have taken place of drug dealers in Liverpool in each of the past three years.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 6 December 1993]: The available information is of convictions and cautions for the two offences commonly associated with drug dealing, i.e. unlawful supply and possession with intent to supply unlawfully. Figures for the Merseyside police force area for the last three years for which data are available, are given in the table.

Table: persons found guilty or cautioned for offences of unlawful supply of a controlled drug, or possession of a controlled drug with intent to supply unlawfully

Merseyside police force area Number of persons

Year	Unlawful supply	Possession with intent to supply
1990	137	143
1992	120	163

Some persons may have been convicted or cautioned for both offences, so columns cannot be added together to obtain totals.

Life Sentences

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been convicted for murder each year since the abolition of the death sentence; if he will present in tabular form the number of years' life sentence each of these individuals served before release, again classifying it by the year of conviction; and if he will also detail the number who are still serving their sentence again classified by year of conviction.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of people convicted of murder in England and Wales in each year 1965 to 1992 are tabulated below. Data on time served before release are not available in the precise form requested, but table 8.4 of "Prison statistics England and Wales 1991", Cm 2157 shows data for all life sentence prisoners received by Prison Service establishments. A copy is available in the Library of the House.

DEFENCE

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Hanley: My Department's centrally controlled expenditure for advertising, broken down into media categories, for 1979-80, 1985-86 and 1992-93 and estimated expenditure for 1993-94 is as follows:

Advertising

Financial year	Television	Radio	Press	Total
1979-80	2·280	0·040	5·750	8·070
1985-86	1·820	0·020	6·820	8·660
1992-93	2·521	0·001	6·178	8·700
1993-94	2·372	Nil	6·408	8·780

Note: All figures are expressed in £ million.

Housing

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are his Department's plans regarding security arrangements for housing currently occupied by armed forces personnel.

Mr. Hanley: There are no plans to change the Department's security arrangements for housing currently occupied by armed forces personnel, the details of which I am not prepared to reveal. Security is one of many factors being considered by officials looking at the proposal that a housing trust take over the management of the married quarters estate.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money he will be spending in the next two years on upgrading the physical condition of married quarters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: It is not our practice to reveal the future expenditure plans of Ministry of Defence budget holders at this level of detail.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what plans he has to ensure that the transfer of the administration of married quarters to a housing trust will not involve any change in the level of rents; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has to increase the rents of married quarters.

Mr. Hanley: The rents paid by service personnel for married quarters are set on the basis of recommendations made by the armed forces pay review body. This will continue to be the case after the transfer of the married quarters estate to a housing trust. The proposed transfer will not therefore affect the method by which rents paid by individual service personnel are determined.

Tornado GR1

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what factors have been identified as possible reasons for improvement in the Tornado GR1 accident record.

Mr. Hanley: The statistical period involved is too short to draw any firm conclusions; however, the factors which may have contributed to the reduction in the Tornado GR1 accident rate include a greater level of experience among current aircrew and the increased flying hours in support of current overseas operations.

Night Low Flying (Scotland)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the nature and purpose of the night low flying without lights which took place at several locations in west and north-west Scotland in the week commencing 18 October; how many and what types of aircraft took part; how many low flying sorties were flown by each type; what proportion of these took place between the hours of 11 pm and 7 am British summer time; at what level of command authority was given for this activity; and what advance information was given to (a) hon. Members, (b) local media and (c) local aviation interests concerning the activity.

Mr. Hanley: It is necessary for the RAF and the Army Air Corps to practise the skills for flying a variety of operations, a number of which would involve flying under cover of darkness and without lights. A period of training to exercise such skills was held in west and north west Scotland between 16 and 28 October. The number of aircraft which took part, the total number of sorties flown and the number flown between 11 pm and 7 am were as follows:

	Total sorties	Sorties between 11 pm and 7 am
1 Chinook	5	3
1 Puma	11	2
5 Lynx	41	6
3 Wessex	20	0
1 Hercules	27	4
2 Tornado	17	0

The exercise was authorised at the appropriate level for such activity. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence wrote to forewarn hon. Members for constituencies principally affected and a brief outline of the exercise was disseminated to local media by HQ Scotland and HQ North West Brigade before it began. Civil aviators were notified of the activity by the aeronautical information service in the usual way.

NATO

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will publish a summary of the United Kingdom's defence plans, together with details of those forces and capabilities that Her Majesty's Government will offer to make available to the alliance during the forthcoming year;

(2) when during 1993 NATO requested Her Majesty's Government to discuss revisions in the United Kingdom's defence plans, and the scale of military forces and capabilities which it makes available to the alliance;

(3) if all members of NATO's integrated military structure are obliged to provide annually to the alliance a detailed statement of their respective defence policies together with a disclosure of those military forces and capabilities which they intend to commit or make available to NATO during the forthcoming year;

(4) if the United Kingdom will be submitting a statement of its defence policy together with details of its military forces and capabilities which it is prepared to place at the disposal of NATO during the forthcoming year, at the Ministerial Defence Planning Committee at its meeting on 8 December;

(5) which other countries which are members of NATO's integrated military structure will be submitting a statement of their defence policies, accompanied by details of those military forces and capabilities which they are prepared to place at the disposal of the alliance during the forthcoming year, at the Ministerial Defence Planning Committee at its meeting on 8 December;

(6) if NATO may oblige any member state of the alliance's integrated military structure to discuss any significant changes in its defence plans and/or the scale of the military forces and capabilities which it makes available to NATO which it seeks to make outside of the annual review cycle conducted each autumn by the Ministerial Defence Planning Committee.

Mr. Hanley: All NATO allies who participate in collective defence planning: Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Turkey, the United Kingdom, and the United States, are obliged to provide annually to the alliance a detailed statement of their defence policy and the military forces and capabilities they intend to commit to NATO. The commitment for the first year of the planning period is taken to be firm. For calendar year 1994 the United Kingdom submitted details to the alliance in July this year in its reply to the annual NATO defence planning questionnaire. An assessment of these plans will be submitted to NATO Defence Ministers at the autumn Ministerial Defence Planning Committee meeting on 8 December. These details are classified and will not be published. In exceptional circumstances the alliance may ask a nation to discuss significant changes in plans outside the annual review cycle. No such request was made of the United Kingdom during 1993.

Tendering

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to ensure that, when putting contracts out to tender, his Department includes the tender list companies which have acquired the BS5750 quality assurance standard.

Mr. Aitken: My Department maintains a list of companies interested in bidding for defence contracts, annotated to show which have achieved the BS5750 quality assurance standard. When seeking tenders for work which merits formal quality assurance procedures, we ensure that only qualified companies are invited to bid. The MOD Contracts Bulletin, which is published fortnightly, makes it clear that certification will normally be required. Since 1 September 1993 the Department has had a policy of "No Acceptable Certification—No Contract", and compliance with this policy is monitored.

Defence Costs

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish the full terms of reference of the defence costs study known as "Front Line First"; and what previous work will be used in the defence costs study.

Mr. Aitken: The defence costs study has been established to take a new and radical look at how the Ministry of Defence conducts its business, including procurement practice, headquarters and manpower costs and all aspects of support to the front line. The purpose will be to identify further areas where we can reduce costs, to ensure that the taxpayers' money we spend on defence is concentrated on the operational effectiveness of our front line force, and to enable our armed forces to discharge their military tasks and commitments properly, to the full and with formidable military capability. The study will build on all relevant previous work.

Ferranti International

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with the management of GEC regarding the future of Ferranti International; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The managements of both GEC and Ferranti International kept my Department informed about their discussions on the future of Ferranti. GEC's decision to make an offer for Ferranti, and its subsequent decision that the offer should lapse, were matters for its commercial judgment.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with his United States of America counterpart regarding the future of Ferranti International; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: My right hon. and learned Friend has had no such discussions.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide details of all the contracts he currently has with Ferranti International; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: It is not my Department's practice to provide details of all our contracts with a company. We have a large number of contracts with Ferranti International, covering a wide range of projects, on which, in the last financial year, we made payments of over £100 million.

Officials of my Department are discussing with the receivers of Ferranti International what can be done to minimise any disruption to the completion of our contracts.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the impact of the failure of GEC to take over Ferranti International on the defence industrial base; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: GEC's decision to let its conditional offer for Ferranti International lapse will in itself have no impact on the defence industrial base. The receivers of Ferranti International have said that they wish to restore trading to near-normality as soon as possible. Any long-term effects on the defence industrial base will depend on the outcome of the receivership.

RAF Support Command (Flying Training)

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has for the future structure of the RAF support command flying training organisation.

Mr. Hanley: As a result of the reduced training requirement for pilots and aircrew in the RAF a study has been conducted into the RAF's flying training organisation to ensure that the training is being provided in the most efficient and cost effective manner possible. The study embraced all seven flying training stations and has examined the scope for rationalisation of tasks. While work remains to be done on the scope for rationalising other types of flying training, the review has concluded that fast jet advanced flying training currently based at RAF Valley and RAF Chivenor, can be rationalised and it is proposed that the task should be centred at RAF Valley. This would mean that flying training would cease at RAF Chivenor on 1 October 1994 and that Chivenor would be placed on a care and maintenance basis from 1 October 1995.

This proposal is expected to save some £127·86 million in net present value terms over 10 years. Some 119 civilian and 779 service posts would be affected. Civilian employees would be offered the range of outplacement services available and redundancies would be kept to a minimum. Any people made redundant would be eligible for compensation under the relevant pension scheme.

This proposal will be the subject of consultation with the trade unions and other interested parties and I have placed a copy of the consultation document in the Library of the House.

Separately I have looked again at the provision of RAF search and rescue facilities in the region and have concluded that the Sea King SAR flight should continue to transfer to Chivenor next year. The move will take place by 1 July 1994 and the Wessex SAR flight currently based at Chivenor will be run on until then.

WALES

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Redwood: The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information. In procurement and all other aspects of IT development and operation, my Department follows the policy and guidance set down by the Government's own IT security authorities.

Tir Cymen Scheme

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the current operation of the Tir Cymen scheme in the three pilot areas in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Tir Cymen, the farm stewardship scheme developed and administered by the Countryside Council for Wales, was launched in July 1992 and operates in three pilot areas based on the local authority districts of Meirionnydd, Dinefwr and Swansea.

In the first year—from 1 October 1992 to 30 September 1993—a total of 201 Tir Cymen agreements were finalised, covering a total area of 24,897 hectares, which represents 13·75 per cent. of the eligible land area. Total payments to farmers for the first year amount to £1,497,733, of which £961,817 is for management and £535,916 is for capital works. A breakdown of the figures for the three pilot areas is given in the table:

Pilot area	Agreements	Area (HA)	Management payment	Capital payment	total payment
Meirionnydd	84	18,500	702,048	206,867	908,915
Dinefwr	89	5,575	224,525	277,233	501,758
Swansea	28	822	35,244	51,816	87,060
TOTAL	201	24,897	961,817	535,916	1,497,733

The response from farmers in these pilot areas has been most positive, with more than 800 inquiries being registered in the first year. A full report on the first year of operation will be published by the Countryside Council for Wales in the new year.

Press and Publicity

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Redwood: The information is as follows:

Date	Staff employed
1993	14
1985	15
1979	15

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowance

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of the hill livestock compensatory allowance scheme in Wales.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mrs.

Knight) by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 30 November 1993 at columns 490-91.

Cattle Tagging

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received on the subject of cattle tagging; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: A consultation letter setting out the details of the Government's proposals for implementing the EC directive on animal identification and registration was issued earlier this year. A number of responses have been received on issues raised in the consultation exercise, including cattle tagging, and these are being considered at the moment.

National Geological Survey

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received on the future of the National Geological Survey department at Aberystwyth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Four. The proposed closure is an operational matter for the British Geological Survey and its parent council, the Natural Environment Research Council. I understand that the remaining mapping needs of Wales will in future be met by staff based at the survey's headquarters, near Nottingham.

Forest Enterprise

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional funding is envisaged for unitary authorities in Wales to assist them to enter into access agreements on Forest Enterprise estates being offered for sale; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend will take decisions on funding for unitary authorities at the appropriate time.

Sheep Quota

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received on the question of the operation of the siphon in the context of sheep quota where it applies to changes in existing partnerships; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Several.

Job Creation

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the percentage of new jobs created by (a) inward investment and (b) British-owned companies since 1991.

Mr. Redwood: Comprehensive information on all new jobs created by every employer in Wales is not held centrally. However, on the basis of offers of regional selective assistance made since 1 January 1991 and subsequently accepted, 41·67 per cent., or 10,348, jobs are promised in foreign-owned companies and 58·33 per cent. or 14,485 in other companies. The figures are based on information given by the relevant companies at the time of their applications and take no account of subsequent developments.

British Steel

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to meet the chairman of British Steel plc to consider the state of the industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I have no immediate plans to meet the Chairman of British Steel.

Unemployment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each constituency and county in Wales the number of long-term unemployed.

Mr. Redwood: The unemployment data requested are available from the NOMIS database, which can be accessed on line by the staff of the Library of the House.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those measures he has adopted to assist manufacturing industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: My Department and the Welsh Development Agency operate a wide range of measures to assist manufacturing industry, a number of which are focused on the key areas of improving productivity and the quality of goods.

The main assistance to Welsh manufacturing comes from the Government's general economic policy, based on low inflation and low interest rates, and a strong competition policy.

Source Wales aims to help Welsh suppliers compete worldwide and, over the last two years, 52 companies have obtained initial contracts worth about £8 million through the programme.

Support for new product development and innovation is provided through the SMART competition for small companies and through the SPUR—support for projects under research—scheme. In the past two years, 51 SMART awards totalling £2·44 million have been made and, since the start of SPUR in 1991, 24 companies have been assisted with a total grant commitment of £2·16 million.

In addition, the regional innovation grants element of the regional enterprise grants scheme aims to improve the performance of small businesses, through the introduction of successful new products and processes. The value of offers under this scheme more than doubled to £1·734 million between 1991-92 and 1992-93, and the number of applications received in the first half of 1993-94 was 5 per cent. higher than in the same period of 1992-93.

Assistance is also provided through various best practice awareness programmes, including: Managing in the 1990s, in which some 2,500 organisations have registered an interest; Inside United Kingdom Enterprise, which includes eight exemplar Welsh companies; and Inside Welsh Industry, which involves 10 Welsh demonstration companies.

The programme of regional technology transfer has included such themes as world class manufacturing, materials management and maintenance in the 26 projects supported over the past three years, with grants totalling £185,000.

Audits intended to identify technology and expertise of interest to industry have been initiated in five Welsh colleges.

My Department has also supported the work of many industry-led initiatives, such as the Wales Quality Centre, the Welsh Medical Technology Forum, and the Mid Wales Manufacturing Group.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of manufacturing jobs (a) created and (b) lost since 1 January 1991.

Mr. Redwood: Comprehensive information on the number of jobs created and lost is not available. According to the Employment Department's Quarterly Estimates Series there was a net decrease in the number of employees in manufacturing in Wales, between December 1990 and June 1993, of 28,000.

Business Closures

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of businesses that (a) closed down and (b) went bankrupt in 1988 and in 1992.

Mr. Redwood: There are no official figures for business closures. The number of companies going into liquidation due to insolvency in England and Wales was 9,427 in 1988, and 24,425 in 1992. The number of personal insolvencies, which could be classified to a trade or profession, was 5,601 in 1988 and 19,525 in 1992.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to meet the chairman of British Aerospace to consider the state of the industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I have no plans to do so at present, but I maintain a close interest in the company's activities in Wales.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many extra people are in employment and what percentage increase that represents over those in employment in 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: According to the Employment Department's Quarterly Estimates Series, the civilian work force in employment in Wales fell by 11,000 between June 1988 and June 1993. This represents a fall of 1 per cent.

Mink Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many mink farms have operated in each county in Wales in each year since 1984; and what is the current figure.

Mr. Redwood: There have been no licenced mink farms in Wales from 1984 to the present.

SCOTLAND

Forestry Commission Land

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list (a) the name, (b) grid reference, (c) area, (d) date of sale and (e) whether formal public access agreements have been established, for each piece of land sold by the Forestry Commission since 1981.

Sir Hector Monro: Lists giving details of the areas of forest land sold by the Forestry Commission from the start of the disposals programme in July 1981 to December 1992 are held in the Library of the House. A list of the forest land sold by the commission in 1993 will be drawn up and placed in the Library in the new year.

These lists do not show grid references which could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Arrangements for securing continued public access to Forestry Commission woodlands after sale, by way of prior agreements entered into between the commission and local authorities, were introduced in October 1991. Most of the sales concluded since then were too far advanced in October 1991 to be considered for an access agreement, while most of the areas brought forward for disposal since that date have still to be sold. At the last count, access agreements had been concluded or were being negotiated in respect of 42 woodlands which were in the process of being sold, although none of these has yet been sold. Local authorities have expressed interest in negotiating agreements in over 40 other areas.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what areas of Forestry Commission land have been offered to conservation bodies.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 November 1993]: At the stage when the Forestry Commission is considering selling land under its disposal programme, notices are placed in the Estates Gazette in respect of all woods larger than five hectares and all other land having a known conservation, recreation or amenity interest. This gives conservation or other bodies an advance opportunity to express an interest in purchase.

If the Government Department or agency responsible for the particular conservation interest concerned gives an unequivocal statement that the acquisition of a property by a conservation body would be in the public interest, and the commission agrees to a sale on these terms, it takes place at open market value.

No central record is kept of these offers and the compilation of a list would involve disproportionate cost.

Local Government

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received from Cumbernauld and Kilsyth concerning his proposals for the future structure of local government; how many of these representations favour his proposals; and how many favour Cumbernauld and Kilsyth becoming part of the proposed east Dunbartonshire council.

Mr. Stewart: Some 70 individual letters have been received from Cumbernauld and Kilsyth on the proposal to include the area within the proposed north Lanarkshire authority. In addition, about 4,000 postcards and petition signatures have been submitted. Most of these representations have asked specifically for the Kilsyth area to be included in the proposed east Dunbartonshire council.

Press and Publicity

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Lang: The number of staff in the Information Officer grades employed, at present, in the Scottish Office information directorate is 30·5 with one vacant post. The comparable figures are 19 staff and one vacant post in 1985 and 22 staff and three vacant posts in 1979, both as at 1 April.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Lang: Expenditure by my Department in 1992-93 was television advertising £831,000, radio advertising £120,000 and press advertising £415,000.

For 1988-89 to 1991-92, the figures were:

	1988-89 £	1989-90 £	1990-91 £	1991-92 £
Television advertising	576,000	974,000	741,000	556,000
Radio advertising	40,000	85,000	188,000	141,000
Newspaper advertising	378,000	1,022,000	613,000	853,000

Figures in the form requested are not available for 1979-80 to 1987-88. Total expenditure on information publicity for 1979-80 was £263,000 and in 1984-85 £704,000.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Lang: The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government departments are stated in the Government IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method (CRAMM) and baseline security for IT systems (BSITS) risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the Government IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation for some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations for the protection of official information.

Forestry Stewardship Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has received on the Forestry Stewardship Council.

Sir Hector Monro: I have received details of the formation of the Forest Stewardship Council, and of its aims.

Glenborrodale Castle Hotel

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was given in grant and loan assistance in respect of Glenborrodale Castle hotel by Highlands and Islands Enterprise and local enterprise companies; what steps have been taken to recover the money following disposal of the hotel to a private owner; what he estimates to be the net cost to public funds; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No financial assistance has been given to Glenborrodale Castle hotel by Highlands and Islands Enterprise, any of its local enterprise companies or its predecessor body the Highlands and Islands development board.

Mr. Peterken

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the duration of Mr. Peterken's contract with the Scottish health service management executive; what will be the annual cost to the Exchequer; and from which budget the additional funds are to be drawn.

Mr. Lang: The duration of Mr. Peterken's contract is until 31 December 1995. The annual cost to the Exchequer will reflect Mr. Peterken's salary, which is within the range for general manager of Greater Glasgow health board—£66,949 to £83,681 from 1 September 1993—and will be met centrally.

Arable Area Scheme

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when his Department first informed the National Farmers Union of Scotland that there was the possibility of an overshoot of the base area in the non-less favoured area region of Scotland under the arable area payment scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department officials first informed the National Farmers Union of Scotland in August of the possibility of an overshoot having occurred this year in the Scottish non-less favoured area arable base area.

A77-M77 Link

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be able to make an announcement about the A77-M77 link road.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Discussions are taking place between the Scottish Office and Strathclyde regional council about this joint project and an announcement will be made in due course.

Appointments

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the occasions on which he has appointed a person to a post in the national health service which has not been advertised.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: Most NHS appointments are the responsibility of individual health boards and trusts. Some staff of the management executive are employees of the Common Services Agency and a number of such staff have been seconded to that body from another NHS employer without their posts being advertised.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy on recruitment of persons to posts in the NHS which have not been advertised.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: Posts in the NHS are in general filled by open advertisement or by secondment from another employer.

Health Service Management

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the management structure of the NHS in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 December 1993]: The management structure is published in the Civil Service Year Book 1993, a copy of which is in the Library of the House of Commons.

Nurses

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of (a) children's and (b) adult intensive care units have four or more whole time equivalent nurses per bed.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The detailed information required to respond is not held centrally. What information is held, however, indicates that 50 per cent. of children's intensive therapy units and 61 per cent. of adult intensive therapy units have on average four or more nursing staff per occupied bed.

Smoke Detectors

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what monitoring regulations he has introduced in relation to the installation of mains-operated smoke detectors in new-build houses in (a) the public housing sector and (b) the private sector; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: With effect from 23 July 1993, applications for warrant to construct new dwellings must provide for smoke alarms to be installed in accordance with the requirements of the Building Standards (Scotland) Regulations Technical Standards. The local authority will not issue a completion certificate unless the dwellings have been constructed in accordance with those standards.

The fact that smoke alarms now need to be wired to a main electricity supply should to a large extent remove any need to monitor the power supply as is the case with battery operated alarms.

There is no provision in the Building (Scotland) Act 1959 for the monitoring of the maintenance of systems but The Scottish Office Environment Department receives information about the effectiveness of the Building Standards Regulations through contacts with building control and fire authorities.

Early indications are that the new smoke alarm provisions have been well received by authorities, builders and house purchasers.

Hospital Building

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the capital allocation for the new hospital building programme announced in November 1992; and what is the current figure.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 6 December 1993]: The capital allocation figure announced in December 1992 was £180 million.

A further £5 million has become available from the current financial year for redistribution amongst health boards and trusts.

Ayrshire and Arran Health Board

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the contracts awarded by Ayrshire and Arran health board during the last 18 months; what was the nature of the contracts awarded; which organisations bid for each contract; what were the organisations holding each contract prior to them being re-awarded; when the contracts were awarded; and what periods were covered by the contracts.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: Details of the contracts negotiated by Ayrshire and Arran health board for the year to 31 March 1994 and their nature are provided in the table below.

In the last 18 months, only urology services have been the subject of a bidding process: that process involved the South Ayrshire Hospitals NHS Trust and the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS Trust with the contract being awarded to the South Ayrshire Hospitals NHS Trust, which already held that contract, for a period to 31 March 1996.

Other changes in service provision within Ayrshire during the last 18 months were the centralisation from 1 April 1993 of ear, nose and throat and oral surgery at Crosshouse hospital under the control of the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS Trust. These services were previously provided by North Ayrshire and Arran NHS Trust and South Ayrshire Hospitals NHS Trust. These changes formed part of the board's local health strategy and had been endorsed by both trusts. These contracts were also awarded for the period to 31 March 1996.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the provisions he has made in his public expenditure plans for Government-supported expenditure and aggregate external finance in 1995-96 and 1996-97.

Mr. Lang: To assist local authorities in their financial planning, I have decided this year to publish planned figures for both Government supported expenditure (GSE) and aggregate external finance (AEF) for the two forward years of the Public Expenditure Survey. The figures for all three years of the survey are as follows:

	1994-95 £ million	1995-96 £ million	1996-97 £ million
AEF	5,272·0	5,378·1	5,494·9

The above amounts of GSE and AEF are inclusive of the following sums which relate to the transfer of resources to local authorities in respect of care in the community and the independent living fund:

1994-95 £ million	1995-96 £ million	1996-97 £ million
115·1	172·1	211·6

The underlying percentage increases in GSE and AEF, excluding the above amounts in respect of care in the community and the independent living fund, over the same three years are as follows:

	1994-95 Per cent.	1995-96 Per cent.	1996-97 Per cent.
AEF	0·97	0·97	1·48

At those levels of GSE and AEF, the average band D council tax need not increase in 1995-96 by more than the forecast inflation rate plus £10, and in 1996-97 by more than the forecast inflation rate alone.

Pending parliamentary approval to changes in organisation, GSE for 1996-97, conventionally, includes provision for local authorities' expenditure on domestic sewerage.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the provision he has made in his public expenditure plans for the costs of local government reform.

Mr. Lang: In determining the level of Government-supported expenditure (GSE) for 1994-95, which I announced on 30 November, I have included £5 million to cover costs which I expect local authorities will incur next year in preparing for local government reform. A separate grant aided expenditure (GAE) assessment will be created for this amount, which I intend will be distributed to all mainland authorities according to a standard formula. Each authority will receive a flat rate sum of £35,000 and the balance of the £5 million will be distributed amongst authorities on a per capita basis.

The precise level of the extra costs which will face authorities as a consequence of reform in 1995-96 and 1996-97 remains uncertain, and will depend on decisions taken by the new authorities. I do not expect the net costs to exceed £30 to £35 million in either year. In determining the planned level of GSE for these years I have assumed that the existing local authorities will incur local government reform costs of £25 million in 1995-96 and £55 million in 1996-97, and that in the latter year there will also be savings of £40 million. The proposed new authorities would therefore incur net reform costs of £15 million in 1996-97. In subsequent years there would be significant net savings. I shall of course continue to consult the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities each year before determining the local government finance settlement.

Entirely outside the settlement I am providing a total of £1·5 million over the three years to cover the costs of the Staff Commission which I intend to establish to assist the reform process, and a further £23 million in 1995-96 to cover the estimated costs of the proposed new authorities during their shadow period.

I believe that these plans make realistic provision for the transitional costs of local government reform, and demonstrate that allegations that the cost of reform will fall entirely on the council tax are completely without foundation.

HEALTH

Community Health Councils

11. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations she has received regarding the merger of community health councils.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Association of Community Health Councils for England and Wales recently met the deputy chief executive of the National Health Service Management Executive and, among other things, raised the issue of CHC mergers. We also received a letter from the association which touched on this subject, among others.

Hospital Closures, Birmingham

12. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received in the last three months regarding hospital closures in Birmingham.

Mr. Sackville: We have received correspondence from a number of people in the west midlands about this issue.

Guy's and St. Thomas's Hospitals

15. Ms Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the proposals from the trust board of Guy's and St. Thomas's to remain on two sites.

Dr. Mawhinney: The trust board's outline business case is being assessed by the south NHS Management Executive outpost on behalf of the London implementation group and it would be premature to make a statement before this assessment work is concluded.

"Making London Worse"

16. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response she has made to the recommendations laid out in the report, "Making London Worse", produced by the Greater London Association of Community Health Councils, a copy of which has been sent to her.

Dr. Mawhinney: We welcome the views of any informed contributor such as the Greater London Association of Community Health Councils on the process of developing London's health services through positive change. We have no plans to make any specific response to this report, but will of course consider it carefully, against the Government's strategy which is set out in "Making London Better".

Adoption Panels

17. Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals she intends to strengthen adoption panels.

Mr. Bowis: We shall consult on this in the new year. We propose to introduce more independent panel members, including adoptive parents and representatives from local interests, such as magistrates committees.

Private Care Homes

18. Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the deregulation of private care and nursing homes.

Mr. Bowis: The Government are committed to ensuring that the interests of residents of residential care and nursing homes are protected and that they receive the care they need in well-run homes.

We have no doubt that regulation to underpin this objective will continue to be necessary, but we are seeking to remove unnecessary controls and to improve the way in which essential regulation is applied and enforced. Any proposed changes would be subject to consultation.

Deaths

19. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths there were in (a) the first and (b) third quarter of 1992 for (i) Britain and (ii) the Northern region.

Mr. Bowis: In the quarter to March 1992, there were 156,060 deaths in England and Wales of which 10,583 occurred in the northern region. The comparative figures for the September quarter were 125,301 deaths and 8,246 deaths respectively.

Queen Elizabeth II Hospital

20. Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she has made a decision on the future of the Queen Elizabeth II hospital; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The future provision of childrens' services in east London will be considered in the light of the findings of a study of these services currently being carried out by the East London and City health authority. This will be completed by the end of January 1994.

NHS Purchasing

21. Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to monitor contracts between purchasers and provider units and to ensure that adequate funds are available for the remainder of the financial year.

Dr. Mawhinney: The National Health Service Management Executive issued guidance on monitoring contracts earlier this year. Recent evidence indicates that generally hospitals are managing their workload smoothly. Local managers are taking the necessary action to ensure activity remains within contract.

Dermatology Provision, Sheffield

22. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on dermatology provision in Sheffield.

Mr. Sackville: Between April and October, dermatologists in Sheffield treated in excess of 16,800 out-patients. In line with patients charter standards, there are no patients waiting more than 18 months for dermatology treatment.

Female Consultants

23. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the 1994 target for female consultants within the NHS; how many there are at present; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Goal 3 of the National Health Service Opportunity 2000 initiative is that by 1994 the percentage of women consultants in England should be 20 per cent. Figures for September 1992 show 2,739 female hospital consultants in England, representing 16·3 per cent. of all hospital consultants.

Clinical Audit

24. Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on establishing clinical audit.

Dr. Mawhinney: Over the past four years considerable work has been done on developing medical, nursing and therapy and primary care audit programmes. Multi-professional clinical audit programmes will contribute greatly to continuing improvement in the quality of patient care.

Hospital Waiting Lists

25. Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients are currently waiting for hospital treatment.

Dr. Mawhinney: Provisional figures for the quarter ending 30 September are available in the Library. These show that regions are meeting the patients charter guarantee that all patients will be seen within a maximum of two years. In addition, no patient has to wait longer than 18 months for hip or knee replacements or cataract surgery.

GP Fund Holders

13. Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what alternatives to general practice fund-holding her Department has costed.

Dr. Mawhinney: All general practitioner practices should be involved in purchasing decisions through their district health authorities, but this is no substitute for fundholding which enables GPs to improve services for their patients by directly managing resources. That is why ever-increasing numbers of GPs are joining the scheme.

26. Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the population of Derbyshire is covered by fund-holding doctors' practices.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information requested is not available centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to contact Sir Michael Carlisle, chairman of Trent regional health authority, for details.

Nurses

27. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses are employed in NHS hospitals within the Liverpool area health authority.

Mr. Sackville: There were 5,030 whole-time equivalent nursing and midwifery staff, excluding agency staff, employed by the national health service within the Liverpool district health authority area at 30 September 1992, the latest figures available.

Transitional Community Care Grant

28. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received regarding the requirement for local authorities to spend 85 per cent. of special transitional community care grant in the independent sector.

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) on 6 December.

London NHS (Debts)

29. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assistance she is giving to London NHS trust and district health authorities to help them resolve their debt problems.

Dr. Mawhinney: As part of the overall resources required for the implementation of "Making London Better", transitional funds have been made available to support London hospitals who have lost contract income from purchasers and to meet the costs of staff redeployment or unavoidable redundancies.

Health Care (North West Thames)

30. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in improving primary and community health care in the North West Thames region.

Dr. Mawhinney: North West Thames regional health authority has committed £9 million this year to developing primary care and community services. In addition, £5 million has been provided from central sources to fund new primary care developments in their part of the London initiative zone. The regional health authority has also recently agreed a comprehensive programme to close all its large mental illness and learning disability hospitals by the year 2000, and to replace them with a full range of local community-based services.

"The Health of the Nation"

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to revise "The Health of the Nation" targets.

Mr. Sackville: "The Health of the Nation" is a long-term strategy, with targets up to 17 years ahead, and we have made good progress in the first year. There is no need to revise the targets; they remain the right ones.

NHS Complaints Procedures

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to publish the report of the review committee into NHS complaints procedures.

Dr. Mawhinney: I understand that Professor Wilson and his colleagues plan to submit their recommendations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at the beginning of February. Decisions on publication will be made at that time.

Prescriptions

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish a table showing (a) the number of prescriptions, (b) total expenditure and (c) expenditure per head of population served for (i) sunscreens and similar protection and (ii) vitamins and dietary supplements for 1992.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is shown in the table.

Sunscreening preparations	81·1	395·0	8·16
Vitamins and dietary supplements	5,833·3	51,009·2	1·05

Notes:

1. The data cover all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered.
2. The data are based on September 1991 British National Formulary section 13.8.1.
3. For net ingredient cost per head Office Population of Censuses and Surveys 1991 mid year resident population projections for 1992 have been used.

Medical Cards

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to change the numbers of any NHS medical cards; and what will be the cost of the changes.

Mr. Sackville: By July 1995, we will have started to replace the present national health service number where it is currently in use with one with a more suitable format. Medical cards will record the replacement number when they are reissued after this date.

The number is being replaced as part of a wider programme to make the new format number the common patient identifier for the NHS. The costs of this programme are estimated at £22 million at today's prices, over the period 1992 to 1995.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether she has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Sackville: The security requirements for information technology systems and services used by central Government Departments are stated in the HMG IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method and baseline security for IT systems risk analysis methods, by the communications electronic security group memorandum No. 10 where appropriate and by supporting advice and guidance published by the HMG IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within Government and have been in operation for some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 29 November 1993, Official Report, column 307, if she will list those district health authorities that (a) gain and (b) lose under the mortality weighted population projections for 1991 to 1996.

Dr. Mawhinney: The district health authority weighted capitation shares were obtained from the regional health authorities. Each region has its own weighted capitation formula for determining the shares of its districts. We do not hold centrally all of the information which would be required to model the effects of population changes on individual DHA shares.

Women's Refuges

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress she is making towards achieving a comprehensive network of women's refuge provision; in which borough areas such a provision currently does not exist; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Earlier this year, the Government published their response—HC 245—to the Home Affairs Select Committee's report on domestic violence. The Select Committee did not recommend that central Government should make more funds available to local refuges. Funding at a local level is a consideration for local authorities and other agencies who are best placed to make decisions on local need and provision.

The need for improved co-ordination of refuge provision is an area which will be given early consideration by members of the ministerial group on domestic violence at its forthcoming inaugural meeting.

Information relating to local refuge provision is not available centrally.

Herbs

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response she has made to the publication by the European Community Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products of a list of herbs which have been banned in other European countries; if she will make it her policy to oppose any such ban on products containing these common herbs in this country; and to ensure that right hon. and hon. Members are kept informed of such proposals emanating from the different agencies of the European Community.

Mr. Sackville: No response was called for, and none has been made. The list is simply a factual record, for information, of herbs that have already been withdrawn from medicinal products for safety reasons in one or more member states. We are not aware of any current proposals for further action in the European Community.

The Government's policy on the licensing of medicinal products is that they must demonstrate acceptable standards of safety, quality and efficacy. This will continue to be applied.

Private Medical Insurance

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people (a) have and (b) do not have private medical insurance by age group, social class and gender.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

"Changing Childbirth"

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research and audit projects her Department has commissioned, and from whom, to evaluate the recommendations made by the expert maternity group in its report "Changing Childbirth"; and what role the national perinatal epidemiology unit will take in the evaluation.

Mr. Sackville: The consultation period for "Changing Childbirth", the report of the expert maternity group, ended on 29 October. Ministers are currently considering the comments received before deciding on future action. Decisions on any evaluation projects to be undertaken will be made as part of this process.

Copies of "Changing Childbirth" are available in the Library.

Sensitive Documents Unit

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement about the operation of her Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Sackville: The Department of Health does not operate a sensitive documents unit. All documents raised within the Department are public records under the terms of the Public Record Acts 1958 and 1967, and have varying degrees of sensitivity.

The Department has a departmental records officer who is responsible for systems for the control of all documents from the time of their creation to final disposal.

In the course of the Department's business, hundreds of thousands of records come within the departmental records officer's purview each year.

Extra-contractual Referrals

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many extra-contractual referrals were refused by each health authority in 1990-91 and 1992-93.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Mental Health Care

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) in relation to each regional health authority area in England how many mentally ill patients from that region were in low security places on 30 June; how many of those patients were in private sector facilities; how many patients were waiting for a community place; and how many of the patients were, in the opinion of their responsible medical officer, fit to move to a community place;

(2) in relation to each regional health authority area in England how many people with learning disabilities are assessed as (a) requiring treatment or care in high security, (b) requiring treatment or care in medium security and (c) requiring treatment or care in low security; how many such people are currently detained in (d) high security, (e) medium security and (f) low security, in relation to those currently detained in secure facilities; how many are currently considered to be in unsuitable facilities; and how many are being cared for in secure private facilities;

(3) in relation to each regional health authority area in England what is the estimated number of people in the region assessed as needing treatment for psychopathic disorder; how many of these detained in secure NHS psychiatric facilities, or in other NHS psychiatric facilities as in-patients, are in touch with other NHS psychiatric facilities as outpatients, or are in local social services authority facilities; how many are in prison; and how many are in private sector health care or other facilities;

(4) in relation to each regional health authority area in England how many mentally ill patients from each region were in medium secure provision on 30 June; how many were in private sector facilities; how many were waiting for admission to less secure accommodation and how many waiting to be discharged to a community place; and how many were, in the opinion of their responsible medical officer, fit to move to less secure accommodation;

(5) in relation to each regional health authority area in England, how many mentally ill patients from each region were in special hospitals on 30 June and which special hospitals they were in; how many of the patients detained in special hospitals were, in the opinion of their responsible medical officer, ready to move to less secure accommodation; how many patients from each region were authorised for discharge but remained in the special hospital; how long each of these patients had been waiting for discharge; what had prevented discharge in each case; what arrangements are in place to ensure that patients in special hospitals are able to be discharged within a year of discharge being authorised; and how these arrangements will be developed to meet the six month maximum waiting time referred to in the NHS planning guidance for 1994-95.

Mr. Bowis: This information is not collected on a routine basis but regional directors of public health were asked in the Department of Health's letter, EL(93)68, to undertake an assessment of needs in their regions, including the numbers of patients needing mental health care at the different levels of security. We are awaiting the full results of this exercise. Copies of the letter (EL(93)68) are available in the Library.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she will announce (a) changes to prescription charges and (b) changes in the proportion of costs paid by dental patients for 1994-95.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 3 December at column 805.

Hospices

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of hospice beds in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: Information on the number of hospice in-patient beds in each of the last five years in England is shown in the table.

Year[1]	Number of hospice beds[2]
1989	1,863
1990	2,093
1991	2,171
1992	2,321
1993	2,409

NHS Trusts

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 1 December, Official Report, columns 583-84, if she will list the remuneration of the chairman of each NHS trust in England.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information requested is not available centrally.

National health service trust chairmen's remuneration is paid on the basis of the following bands:

Unit turnover 1988-89	Band	Rates per annum (£)
In excess of £50 million	Band 1	19,285
Between £20 million and £50 million	Band 2	17,145
Less than £20 million	Band 3	15,125

Administrators

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many new management posts have been created since the NHS reforms; and what they cost.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Surgical Operations

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have now been waiting for more than a year for their operation.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on waiting times for in-patient and day case treatment is given in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", which is published twice yearly. The latest published figures are for March 1993. In addition provisional figures for the quarter ending 30 September 1993 were published on 1 November, in press release H93/1036. Copies of both documents are available in the Library.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many routine operations have now been suspended until the next financial year.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Cervical Smear Tests

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice her Department issues on methods to be adopted in carrying out cervical smear tests;

(2) what action she proposes to take following the findings of the report of the Northern regional health authority on the recall of Dr. Lustman's patients for repeat cervical smears that methods varied according to socio-economic group.

Mr. Sackville: In 1988 the Department of Health circulated to all health authorities the report of an intercollegiate working party on cervical cytology screening which includes guidance on the taking of cervical smears. HSG(93)41 issued in August 1993 updates earlier guidance on the cervical cancer screening programme. This refers both to accepted clinical guidance issued by the British Society for Clinical Cytology on the taking of cervical smears and fail-safe mechanisms for their follow-up. Copies of both documents are available in the Library. All women should have access to the same high standard of service regardless of socio-economic group. It is unacceptable to use an inferior method on such grounds. Variations from the standard method for taking cervical smears are acceptable only on clinical grounds, or where the patient makes an informed choice, in full possession of the clinical facts.

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she proposes to take following the publication of the report of the Northern regional health authority on the recall of Dr. Lustman's patients for repeat cervical smears; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for the Northern regional health authority and Gateshead family health services authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairmen for details.

General Practitioners

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice she intends to issue to consultants on the importance of absolute accuracy and clarity in their advice and/or comments relating to methods adopted by general practitioners.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice she intends to issue to family health services authorities on the importance of verifying verbal assurances from general practitioners that their methods are supported by consultants.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Family Health Services Authorities (Training)

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what training provision in techniques for thoroughness she intends to provide for family health services authority members engaged in practice visits;

(2) what advice she intends to issue to family health services authorities on the importance of keeping accurate records of findings following FHSA practice visits.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Immunisation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what immunisations her Department recommends for children under five travelling to Nigeria.

Mr. Sackville: A United Kingdom resident child should have been immunised routinely against diphtheria, tetanus, polio, whooping cough, measles, mumps, rubella and haemophilus influenzae b. Recommendations for travel, in addition to the above immunisations, will depend on factors such as purpose of visit—holiday or parents' occupation—length of stay, area to be visited and season of the year. They include, for Nigeria, hepatitis A human normal immunoglobulin, or hepatitis A vaccine where prolonged protection is required, typhoid—but not for infants under 12 months of age—yellow fever—but not for infants under nine months of age—and meningococcal meningitis. Advice in specific cases should be sought from a general practitioner or travel clinic.

Regional Health Authorities

Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what financial allocations each regional health authority will receive in 1994-95.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I am today sending each regional health authority details of their main revenue allocations for resident population. These are set out in table 1. They are provisional until Parliament approves the relevant supply estimate.

Regions are to receive an average cash increase of 5·4 per cent., and I have decided that all regions should get a minimum increase of 0·7 per cent. above forecast inflation.

This will enable all regions to make faster progress towards equalisation of resources at district health authority level.

Table 2 sets out the main capital planning totals for each region. Regional health authorities and National Health Service Management Executive outposts will be giving me agreed proposals for how much of these planning totals should be spent by trusts and how much by health authorities. These will form the basis of external financing limits for trusts and capital cash limits for regional health authorities.

Table 3 sets out the cash-limited resources being made available to fund general practice expenditure. This will fund practice staff in fund-holding and non-fund-holding practices, premises improvements costs, and non-fund-holding computer costs. This represents a cash increase of 5·9 per cent.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioner Incomes

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been (a) the mean and (b) the median increase each year from 1979 to 1990-91 in the incomes of (i) single male pensioners aged 65-74, (ii) single female pensioners aged 60-74, (iii) all single pensioners under 75, (iv) pensioner couples under 75, (v) single male pensioners aged 75 and over, (vi) single female pensioners aged 75 and over, (vii) all single pensioners aged 75 and over and (viii) pensioner couples aged 75 years and over; and in each case for which the figures are available if he will break the figures down by quintile groups.

Mr. Hague: The answer is in the tables.

Benefit Statistics

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will disaggregate the total expenditure figures in table 1 of "The Growth of Social Security," in order to show the different growth rates of (a) national insurance basic retirement pension, (b) national insurance unemployment benefit, (c) naational insurance invalidity benefit, (d) family allowance/child benefit, (e) national assistance/supplementary benefit/income support, (f) one-parent benefit, (g) housing benefits and (h) rate rebates/community charge benefit.

Mr. Scott: The information requested in relation to national insurance basic retirement pension, national insurance unemployment benefit and family allowance/child benefit is in the table. Invalidity benefit and one-parent benefit were introduced in 1971 and 1980 respectively and information about growth in expenditure on these is in table 9a of "The Growth of Social Security." Meaningful comparisons of the growth rates since 1949 in national assistance/supplementary benefit/income support, housing benefit and rate rebates/community charge benefit are not possible because of changes in the structure of provision in the benefit system.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received regarding financial difficulties facing people who have been in private care or nursing homes since before 1 April.

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply to the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on 6 December.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Hague: The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government departments are stated in the Government IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method (CRAMM) and baseline security for IT systems (BSITS) risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the Government IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice and have been developed specifically for use within Government and have been in operation for some time. The Department of Social Security's IT security standards have been devised in accordance with the above, and the need for compliance with them is being referenced in relevant contracts.

The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Hague: The Department of Social Security does not operate a sensitive documents unit. However, all documents raised within the Department are public records under the terms of the Public Records Acts 1958 and 1967, and have varying degrees of sensitivity. The Department has a departmental records officer, who is responsible for systems for the control of all documents from the time of their creation to final disposal. In the course of the Department's business, millions of records come within the departmental records officer's purview each year.

Press and Publicity

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Scott: The numbers are:

Headquarters—22
Benefits Agency—21
Child Support Agency—3
Contributions Agency—1

Before 1988 the Department was part of DHSS and separate figures for Social Security are not available.

Social Fund

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many homeless people, who are living in hostels on a temporary basis, have applied for but have been refused a social fund community care grant or loan; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many refugees have, following an offer of permanent accommodation, applied for but been refused social fund start-up grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I understand from Michael Bichard, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Family Credit

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parents currently receive family credit.

Mr. Burt: The number of lone parents in receipt of family credit was 206,000 at the latest available date.

Source: 5 per cent. sample of family credit recipients at 30 April 1993.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish figures showing the proposed family credit ceilings in 1994-95 for each of (a) a married couple with one child aged under five years, (b) a married couple with two children aged under 11 years, (c) a married couple with two children aged over 11 years, (d) a married couple with three children aged under 11 years, (e) a married couple with three children aged over 11 years and (f) a married couple with two children aged under 11 years and two children aged over 11 years.

Mr. Burt: At the new benefit levels proposed for April 1994, the family credit ceilings represented by the highest amount of net earnings and other relevant income a family can have and still qualify for family credit at the minimum payment of 50p will be as follows:

Married couple with one child under 5 years	150·27
Married couple with two children under 11	166·27
Married couple with two children over 11 (but under 16)	187·27
Married couple with three children under 11	182·27
Married couple with three children over 11 (but under 16)	213·77
Married couple with two children under 11 and two children over 11 (but under 16)	219·27

Relevant income excludes child benefit, which is disregarded for family credit purposes. Therefore, in addition to the amounts above, a one-child family will have £10·25 child benefit, a two-child family £18·45, a three-child family £26·70 and a four-child family £34·95. Relevant income also excludes the first £15 of any maintenance payable.

From October 1994, up to £40 a week will be disregarded in the calculation of net earnings in respect of formal childcare costs incurred where there is a child under 11 in the family of a couple where both are working, or where one is working and the other is incapacitated, increasing the potential ceilings still further. The disregard will also apply to lone parent families.

Lone Parent Families

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parent families, headed by a mother under the age of 21 years are currently in receipt of (a) family credit, (b) housing benefit and (c) disability working allowance.

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table:

Lone parent mothers under the age of 21

Type of benefit	Numbers	Date
Family Credit	1,240	30 April 1993
Housing Benefit	36,000	May 1992[1]
Disability Working Allowance	Nil	30 June 1993

[1] Sample taken May 1992.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parent families are currently headed by a mother in receipt of disability working allowance.

Mr. Scott: There are 266 such families.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parent families currently receive housing benefit.

Mr. Burt: The number of lone parents in receipt of housing benefit in Great Britain in May 1992—the latest date for which figures are available—was approximately 816,000.

Unemployment

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) at what level, in current prices, he intends to set the rates of the recently announced job seekers allowance for an unemployed person under 25 years of age who (a) would currently qualify for unemployment benefit and (b) would currently only qualify for income support;

(2) what is the current payment to a single, unemployed person under 25 years of age if he or she (a) qualifies for unemployment benefit and (b) is able to claim only income support.

Mr. Burt: The rates for job seeker's allowance for those under 25 years of age will be announced at the appropriate time before April 1996. It is intended that these will be based upon income support levels. The current levels of benefit are given, with the rates that will apply from April 1994 shown in parentheses.

An unemployed person under 25 years who qualifies solely for unemployment benefit and has no overlapping social security benefit is paid £44·65 (£45·45) a week.

If entitled to income support, the rate of personal allowance would be £34·80 (£36·15) if aged between 18 and 24, or £26·45 (£27·50) if aged 16 or 17. The higher rate of £34·80 (£36·15) also applies to people aged 16 or 17 who are of necessity living independently.

Disability

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the number of people in receipt of disability living allowance, for each component and attendance allowance, for each component in (a) the London borough of Newham, (b) the Wembley disability benefits centre and (c) nationally.

Mr. Scott: The administration of disability living allowance and attendance allowance are matters for Mr. Michael Bichard, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mr. Tony Banks, dated 6 December 1993:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking what are the number of people in receipt of Disability Living Allowance (DLA), for each component and Attendance Allowance (AA), for each component in (a) the London Borough of Newham, (b) the Wembley Disability Benefits Centre (DBC) and (c) nationally.

The information that you have requested for people in the London Borough of Newham and also for DLA payments in the area covered by Wembley DBC are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, the information in the following table answers a part of your question. The latest available figures are for quarter ending 31 March 1993.

DLA

	National Care Component
Higher rate care	206,000
Middle rate care	293,000
Lower rate care	154,000
Total	653,000
Mobility Component
Higher rate mobility	887,000
Lower rate mobility	145,000
Total	1,032,000

For AA there is only one component which is care, although there are two rates for which I have provided details.

	National	Wembley DBC
Higher rate	368,000	51,000
Lower rate	522,000	78,000
Total	890,000	129,000

All figures are provisional and are rounded to the nearest thousand.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has formed of the effect of the change in weather stations used for the calculation of the cold weather payments for Ayrshire during the recent cold spell.

Mr. Scott: The administration of cold weather payments is a matter for Michael Bichard, the Chief Executive to the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mr. George Foulkes, dated 6 December 1993:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the effect of the change in weather stations used for the calculation of Cold Weather Payments for Ayrshire.

The reason for the change of weather station for Ayrshire was the closure of the station at Prestwick. Prestwick station no longer provides any data to the Meteorological Office and it is therefore not possible to say if Prestwick would have triggered any Cold Weather Payments in the recent cold weather.

The replacement station for that part of the mainland affected by the change (Postcodes KA1-26 and KA28-30) is Glasgow Airport. This weather station has triggered cold weather payments for the period 19 November to 25 November, when the running seven-day mean temperature was –0·3 degrees Centigrade. These payments have now been issued.

The only part of Prestwick's old area not covered by the Glasgow weather station is the Isle of Arran (Postcode KA27), which was reassigned to the weather station at Macrihanish. Macrihanish station has not triggered any payments yet this winter. The running seven-day mean temperature ending 25 November 1993, was 3·4 degrees Centigrade.

Information provided by the Meteorological Office is that the Glasgow station historically records lower temperatures than Prestwick and is, therefore, more likely to trigger payments. The Meteorological Office have also informed us that the weather station at Macrihanish best reflects the weather on the Isle of Arran.

I hope that this reply has been helpful.

"Quarterly" and "Challenge"

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out the annual cost of the publication of (a) "Quarterly" and (b) "Challenge" magazines.

Mr. Hague: The cost of "Quarterly" magazine for the last full financial year was: £125,528·75. The estimated cost in 1993-94 is: £119,783·60.

There has been only one issue of "Challenge" magazine, which was published at a cost of £9,500.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to announce the outcome of his review of the workings of the Child Support Agency.

Mr. Burt: The Child Support Agency was set up to secure more maintenance, more reliably, for more children and that is what it is doing. We have been examining the comments and concerns being raised about some of the aspects of the scheme and will consider carefully the recommendations of the Social Security Select Committee, to which a response will be given in due course.

Income Support

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list by each parliamentary constituency in the city of Birmingham the number of persons without accommodation claiming income support at the latest convenient date and 12 and 24 months earlier.

Mr. Burt: I understand from Mr. Michael Bichard, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many industrial disablement claims for asbestos-related diseases referred to special medical boards, and the numbers in which the diseases were diagnosed in each year since 1991 in the same format as tables given in reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) of 28 January 1992, Official Report, columns 514-16.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 25 November 1993, column 174]: The information given contained a typographical error. The figure in the 1992 table for Newcastle under "References" column D1 should read 285, not 205 as shown. This does not affect the totals.

EMPLOYMENT

Deregulation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what response he has made to the report on deregulation, produced by the GMB trade union, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have seen and read the report, and have written to Mr. Edmonds, General Secretary of the General, Municipal and Boilermakers Union—GMB—in the following terms:

> Your letter of 18 November to the Secretary of State enclosed a copy of your document "Freedom to Kill? The Case Against Deregulation". I understand that your colleague Mr. Nigel Bryson has already received comments on your document from Frank Davies, Chairman of the Health and Safety Commission (HSC) and Mr. John Rimington, Director-General of the Health and Safety Executive (HSE).
> As you know, the review arises from an invitation from me to the HSC earlier this year, asking them to look at health and safety regulation with the aim of reducing any undue burdens which it may impose on business, especially small firms. As you said in your letter, the 1974 Health and Safety at Work Act has provided a sensible framework for improvements to safety in the workplace. HSC accepted my invitation in the context of its mandate under section 1 of the Act to remove outdated, unnecessary and technologically redundant legislation from the statute book. The review builds upon and continues that work.
> I was therefore astounded to read your report's confused account of the HSC Review of Regulations. I find it surprising that the GMB should wish to mislead the public on such important work, the aim of which is to develop an even more effective health and safety legislative framework. More surprisingly still, the report makes a barely concealed attack upon the integrity of the HSC, an independent tripartite body.
>
> I should not need to remind you that the seven Sector Task Groups, which are helping the HSC take the work of the review forward, have trade union members (including one from the GMB); and the Steering Group for the Review, under the Chairmanship of Miss Jenny Bacon, one of the HSE's Deputy Directors General, contains representatives from the TUC. It says little for your confidence in your colleagues if you endorse the conclusions of the report that there is a "hidden agenda" or "predetermined outcome."
> There is certainly no intention of increasing "freedom for employers to go back to 19th century working conditions" now, or at any time in the future. Two Press Notices were issued recently, in response to garbled Press accounts of what was supposedly in the Deregulation Bill, which made this perfectly clear.
>
> Indeed I believe that if people find it easier to understand their legal obligations as a result of the review of regulations currently being undertaken by HSC, they will be better able to comply —and that has to result in better health and safety standards for workers. Some employers have argued that section 1 (2) of the 1974 Act inhibits sensible legislative change. The HSC review is looking at this, and the Government will decide what if anything to do in the light of this and any other evidence. In the meantime, I await the advice of the HSC.
> HSC has already emphasised that the review needs to look not only at the substance of individual regulations but at the broader aspects of the regulatory regime. This includes: how to reduce the burden of paperwork imposed on business by health and safety regulations; the enforcement practices of HSE and local authority inspectors; and the further consolidation of all health and safety legislation to produce a simpler legislative framework designed to maintain or improve the standards of health and safety.
> Any proposals for legislative change arising from the review will themselves be subject to the usual consultation procedures. Good standards of health and safety save business money in terms of less lost production due to accidents and so on. They also prevent illness, death and injury which costs individuals and the community dear. In simplifying and clarifying the requirements of the law, a system of regulation will be created which is easier for everyone to understand and easier for employers in particular to comply with. I am disappointed that the GMB does not appear to be able to agree with that aim.

Workplace Nurseries

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many workplace nursery facilities have been financially assisted from Government resources; and if he will list where each is located.

Miss Widdecombe: Since 1990 the Government have granted tax exemption to workplace nurseries as a benefit in kind. No figures are held as to the number of facilities thereby assisted.

The civil service runs 40 nurseries for its employers, several joint ventures with other employers, and over 120 holiday play schemes. They are listed in the Cabinet Office's Childcare Bulletin for October 1993 which is available in the Library.

Disabled People (Sheffield)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what has been spent on disabled individuals in the Sheffield area over the last five years on assistance towards (a) special aids to employment, (b) adaptations to premises, (c) fares to work and (d) the personal reader scheme;

(2) how many disabled individuals in the Sheffield area have benefited from the Government's present provision of assistance towards (a) special aids to employment, (b) adaptions to premises (c) fares to work and (d) personal reader service over the last five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Mrs. Helen Jackson, dated 7 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Questions to him about what has been spent on disabled individuals in the Sheffield area, and how many disabled individuals in the Sheffield area have benefitted from the Government's present provision of assistance over the last five years on assistance towards (a) special aids to employment, (b) adaptations to premises, (c) fares to work and (d) the personal reader service.

The information you have asked for is not held centrally and I have asked my people to investigate the availability of the details you request. I will send details to you as soon as they are available.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Disabled People (Employment Symbol)

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment his Department has carried out as to the degree to which companies who display the two-tick symbol denoting them as positive about disabled people are complying with the criteria required.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Mr. Robert Ainsworth, dated 7 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about what assessment his Department has carried out into the degree to which companies who display the disability symbol are meeting the commitments expected of symbol users. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Use of the disability symbol is a voluntary step taken by an organisation which considers that its employment practices are consistent with the commitments required of symbol users, and which wants to ensure that disabled people know this. Users must accept five commitments:

to interview all job applicants with a disability who meet the minimum criteria for a job vacancy; to consult disabled employees to ensure that they can develop their abilities at work; to take steps to retain employees who become disabled to make sure they stay in employment; to ensure that key employees develop the awareness of disability needed to make employers' commitments work;

and each year, to reviewing achievements and planning improvements.

The first four commitments are intended as a starting point for good practice, the fifth to help them monitor progress and make sure that their commitments are working in practice.

Employers preparing to adopt the symbol are encouraged to first discuss the symbol commitments in detail with a representative of my local Employment Service Placing, Assessment and Counselling Team (PACT). The PACT will advise on ways to meet the commitments within the particular organisation and, if necessary, suggest steps to be taken before the organisation formally adopts the symbol. Although it will be most useful for employers to call on their PACT when first preparing to adopt the symbol they may seek advice at any stage. The PACT role in monitoring employers' use of the symbol is thus one of helping rather than policing.

As far as possible the commitments involve specific, observable actions and will be self-policing. We believe that employers are unlikely to sign up unless they intend to take them seriously. We would of course take up with a symbol user any complaint received from disabled people that the commitments were not being met in their case and if, exceptionally, it became clear that the symbol was being abused, we would ask the firm to stop using it. In the main, however, we expect to resolve difficulties through discussion to resolve any misunderstandings about what the commitments involve in practice.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administrative Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Health and Safety

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many health and safety inspectors there are in Wales; and from which locations they work.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of inspectors permanently employed by the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) and based in Wales at 1 November 1993 was 63. The locations from which they work are HSE field operations division area and local offices in Cardiff, Wrexham, and Carmarthen.

Car Boot Sales

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to strengthen health and safety regulations at car boot sales.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None.

Workstart Project

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for each workstart pilot project, what is the number of places available for unemployed people and the number actually taken up.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 3 December 1993]: Each of the four workstart pilots has funding to place up to 250 long-term unemployed people into employment.

On 23 November the number of people in employment supported under workstart in each pilot area was as follows:

	Number
South London	40
East Kent	35
Tyneside	30
Devon and Cornwall	3

The rate of take up in workstart is increasing. The Tyneside training and enterprise council (TEC) is working closely with the local employment service to match individual unemployed people to specific vacancies. The other TEC-run pilot, in Devon and Cornwall, is now adopting a similar approach to improve performance.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average length of time (a) males over 35 years, (b) males over 16 and under 35 years, (c) women over 16 and under 35 years and (d) women over 35 years remain unemployed.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 29 November 1993]: Analysis of the computerised records relating to claimants whose spell of unemployment was completed in the period between 10 September and 14 October gives the following median durations of unemployment: those aged between 16 and 35; males—15·7 weeks, females—11·2 weeks: those aged 35 and over; males—21·9 weeks, females—15·9 weeks.

Analysis of a 5 per cent. sample of these same claimants shows that their mean duration of unemployment was as follows: those aged between 16 and 35; males—32 weeks, females—22·7 weeks: those aged 35 and over; males—39·9 weeks, females—29·3 weeks.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide a table showing the number of vacancies in jobcentres that were (a) temporary and (b) permanent in each quarter from April 1987 in each region.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Mr. Alan Milburn, dated 6 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him asking about the number of vacancies notified to Jobcentres since April 1987. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

On 30 July, in response to an earlier question from you on this subject, I sent you details of permanent and temporary notified vacancies from April 1987 until 2 July 1993. For ease of reference this information has been repeated again in the attached tables. In addition, information has been added to cover the period 3 July 1993 to 8 October 1993.

As I explained in my earlier letter, changes to the ES area and regional structure means that information is not available in the form requested in respect of the period April 1987 to March 1990. To obtain this information would require direct approaches to my local offices. Given the size of the ES network this would be a disproportionate cost and I am sorry I am unable to supply the detailed information for the earlier period. However, information covering Great Britain as a whole is available and this is also attached.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the library of the House.

Giro Delivery

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what irregularities there have been in the delivery of unemployment benefit giros in the Clydebank and Milngavie area in the past month; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M Fogden to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 7 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about irregularities in the delivery of Unemployment Benefit giros in the Clydebank and Milngavie area in the past month. This is something which falls within the responsibilities he has delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

There have been two delays in the delivery of Unemployment Benefit giros to the Clydebank and Milngavie area in the past month. The first occurrence was on Friday 19 November and was caused by the failure of Royal Mail to ensure that the giro mail bag was loaded onto the appropriate evening flight from Heathrow Airport. This mail was delivered by first post on Monday 22 November.

The second failure was on Friday 26 November and was due to adverse weather conditions (fog) at Heathrow. There were many flight delays on that Friday evening due to the fog. Mail as a consequence had to be transferred onto the Saturday morning flight.

As both delays occurred on a Friday, when mail arrived at the sorting/delivery offices on Saturday morning it has missed the first and only delivery of the day.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by what method unemployment benefit giros are delivered to the Clydebank and Milngavie area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 7 December 1993:

This is something which falls within the responsibilities he has delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Unemployment Benefit giros are delivered by Royal Mail via the first class postal system. UB giros are handed to Royal Mail ready for sorting and despatch from the Computer Centre in Reading by noon on the day prior to delivery to the client.

From this point on the responsibility for the delivery of Unemployment Benefit giros lies with Royal Mail.

Any failure on their part to deliver the girocheques on time are the subject of immediate representation on our part for an investigation as to the clause.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive Replies to Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the library of the House.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to improve the delivery of giros to the Clydebank and Milngavie area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 7 December 1993:

This is something which falls within the responsibilities he has delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Strong representations have been made to Royal Mail and through them to their third parties, British Airways and British Midland to ascertain what steps needed to be taken to ensure consistent delivery of girocheques to our Scottish clients. As a consequence, an agreement has been reached with Royal Mail and British Airways for girocheques to be treated as priority security mail. This means that they will be placed on the first available flight out of Heathrow to Scotland rather than await the regular scheduled 18.00 hours flight as had previously been the case.

We will be monitoring this new arrangement closely to ensure girocheques are delivered on time to our clients in Scotland.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what rights are conveyed by the citizens charter in respect of the late or unpredictable payment of benefits.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 7 December 1993:

This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

It may be helpful if I explain that the policy of the Employment Service is to issue a prompt replacement whenever a girocheque is reported not received, lost, stolen, or destroyed unless there is reason to doubt the report is genuine.

The ES is currently in the process of updating the Jobseeker's Charter, and the above girocheque replacement policy will be reflected within it.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will place a copy of this letter in the library of the House.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is not all readily available. Data on district registry fee income are not disagregated, so no separate data are held for issue fees in High Court registries. Plaint and issue fee income in the county courts for the years requested was as follows:

1988-89	59,317,960·34
1989-90	71,177,637·85
1990-91	85,882,609·11
1991-92	99,954,524·94

EDUCATION

Religious Education

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many responses he has received from the standing advisory councils for religious education to the draft DFE circular 10/93.

Mr. Robin Squire: None. DFE circular 10/93 deals with the grants for education support and training programme for 1994-95, and seeks responses only from local education authorities.

The Department has received 42 responses from the standing advisory councils for religious education to the draft circular "Religious Education and Collective Worship", which issued on 11 October.

Legal Courses

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) how many discretionary grants have been awarded by local education authorities to enable students to pursue (a) the legal practice course and (b) the bar finals;

(2) what is the standard level of discretionary grant given by local authorities for (a) legal practice course and (b) the bar finals course.

Mr. Boswell: The information requested is not collected centrally. The provision of discretionary awards is a matter for local education authorities, as is the value of such awards.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) how many students are currently taking (a) the legal practice course and (b) the bar finals course;

(2) how many self-financing students are currently taking (a) the legal practice course and (b) the bar finals course.

Mr. Boswell: Information from the Law Society shows that 6,566 students were enrolled on the legal practice course for 1993-94. For the bar finals course, the Council of Legal Education's statistics show that 1,022 students took the course in 1992-93. Figures for numbers of self-financing students are available only for the bar finals course. These show that during 1992-93 618 out of 1,022 students received no local authority grant.

Office for Standards in Education

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on the relationship between Ofsted and the Department for Education.

Mr. Robin Squire: Ofsted is a non-ministerial Government Department established by the Education (Schools) Act 1992. It is headed by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector for Schools, Professor Stewart Sutherland, who is required to advise my right hon. Friend on the quality of education and standards achieved in schools and to oversee the new system of independent four-yearly inspections of schools.

My right hon. Friend wrote to all hon. Members on 11 November 1992 explaining the work of Ofsted and its relationship with the Department.

Sex Education

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education whether local education authorities will be required to monitor the numbers of parents exercising their right to withdraw their children from sex education lessons.

Mr. Forth: No.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) what plans he has to introduce mandatory sex education and at what ages;

(2) what he is doing to introduce compulsory AIDS tuition into schools.

Mr. Forth: Under the Education Act 1993, all maintained secondary schools will from autumn 1994 be required to provide sex education for all their registered pupils, including education about HIV and AIDS. All maintained special schools will be required to provide such education for all their pupils of secondary age.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many parents exercised the right to exclude their children from sex education lessons in the years 1990, 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Forth: There was no statutory right for parents to withdraw their children from sex education lessons in the years in question. Under section 241 of the Education Act 1993 we are introducing, from September 1994, the right for the parent of a pupil in attendance at any maintained school to withdraw that pupil from all or part of the school's sex education provision other than those elements which are a requirement of the national curriculum.

Union Flag

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the cost of purchasing and installing the Union flag in the foyer of the Department for Education.

Mr. Forth: The cost of purchasing the flag, the flagstaff and base was £150, excluding VAT.

PRIME MINISTER

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Prime Minister what has been the cost of bomb-proofing (a) No. 10 and (b) No. 11 Downing street.

The Prime Minister: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Prime Minister what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

The Prime Minister: The charge to my office for ministerial use of the Government car service during 1992-93 was £107,395. Two vehicles are involved.

EU Summit

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what matters in regard to environmental protection he intends to raise at the European Union Heads of Government summit in Brussels on 10 to 11 December.

The Prime Minister: The Council will focus on the European economy and the Commission White Paper on growth, competitiveness and employment. It will also consider the Commission's report on subsidiarity. I shall continue to emphasise the importance of properly sustainable development, in accordance with the treaty provisions.

TRANSPORT

Trans-European Road Network

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the route and construction of United Kingdom roads included in the trans-European road network are subject to the planning process; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: All schemes in the Department's roads programme, including any on routes in the trans-European road network, are subject to the same procedures.

Motorway Cones

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals his Department has to improve the safe and secure laying of cones and the removal of unnecessary cones on motorways; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The laying out of traffic cones has to follow procedures laid down in chapter 8 of the Traffic Signs Manual. This sets out British standards requirements for the cones themselves, how they should be positioned at roadworks—in the interests of road workers' safety as well as road users—and how they should be removed as soon as they are no longer required. It is a condition of highway contracts on motorways and other trunk roads that contractors, and their traffic management sub-contractors, adopt the requirement of chapter 8. Together with Health and Safety at Work etc. Act legislation, this already imposes considerable safety obligations on all those concerned with the placement, management and removal of traffic cones. Nevertheless, the Department is constantly reviewing its safety procedures and guidance.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents have occurred on motorways as a result of stray motorway cones in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: My Department does not keep records or statistics which show whether any motorway accidents have been caused by stray traffic cones.

East and West Coast Main Lines

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the estimated repayments which will need to be made on capital raised for improvements to the west coast main line; how these costs will be recouped; what estimate he has as to the average extra cost per journey for passengers and carriers of freight imposed by the need to make these repayments; and what are the equivalent projected costs on the east coast line.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend announced on 1 December that Railtrack will be working with the private sector to devise new performance standards for the west coast main line and that a private sector consortium will be selected by competition to build and maintain the line.

The precise cost of the project, and therefore the level of repayments, will not be known in advance of that competition.

Cost comparisons with the east coast main line are inappropriate. The east coast main line project, from commencement of planning to the start of the new service in 1991, took some 10 years to complete. The lines also have different patterns of use.

Roads, Southport

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he next expects to visit Southport to inspect the site of proposed improvements to the trunk road network to Preston;

(2) when he expects to visit Southport to inspect the site of the A565 proposed road improvements;

(3) when he expects to visit Southport to inspect the site of the A570 Ormskirk to Southport bypass.

Mr. Key: It would be a pleasure to visit my hon. Friend's constituency, but I have no plans to visit the sites of these proposed schemes. I shall, though, consider carefully the response to public consultation on the proposed improvements to the A570 and A59 trunk roads.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Scott: Such information as is available is in the table.

	Television £	Radio £	Press £
1989-90	4,911,000	402,000	1,486,000
1991-92	4,396,000	626,000	772,000
1992-93	1,792,000	429,000	2,296,000

Notes:

1. The total spend in 1990-91 was £4,360,000 but a breakdown is not immediately available.
2. The Department did not exist independently prior to August 1988.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out the average length of time taken by the Child Support Agency to reply in full to a letter from an hon. Member.

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) by the chief executive of the Child Support Agency on 29 November at column 429.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what information he has on dealers at car boot sales fraudulently claiming benefits;

(2) if he will list the occupations most frequently claimed by those fraudulently claiming benefit.

Mr. Hague: The administration of benefit fraud is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend with such information as is available.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Douglas French, dated 7 December 1993:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Questions about the occupations of people fraudulently claiming benefit; including in particular dealers at car boot sales.

I regret that I am unable to provide the information you request as statistics are not kept on the occupations of those who are found to be fraudulently claiming benefit.

I can tell you, however, that from October this year I have established a new Security Branch with a responsibility to ensure a co-ordinated and strategic approach to fraud and security matters; and to protect future expenditure against fraud and abuse.

Part of this co-ordinated response is to maintain statistics that allow analysis of the fraud effort in terms of prevention, deterrence and detection. At the same time we must ensure that statistics are not kept for their own sake and to this end the new Branch is currently examining what statistics are necessary to achieve the three aims I have outlined.

I am sorry that on this occasion I cannot be more helpful.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Industrial Development Boards

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total budget allocated by his Department to industrial development boards in 1992-93 in (a) the Northern region and (b) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Sainsbury: The industrial development boards advise my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on applications for selective financial assistance and on industrial opportunities within their areas. The boards do not have budgetary responsibility for schemes providing selective financial assistance which have centrally held budgets.

Consultants

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the names of the consultants employed to review the future of (a) the Patent Office, (b) Warren Springs Laboratory and (c) AEA Technology and the costs of employing such consultants in the year 1992-93, with the sum estimated for 1993-94.

Mr. Heseltine: The consultants employed in each case were (a) Price Waterhouse, (b) PA Consulting and (c) BZW. The fees paid to these firms are confidential for commercial reasons.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the Ministers in his Department who since June 1987 have visited (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malysia, (c) Singapore and (d) South Africa on official business; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

Mr. Heseltine: A central record of official ministerial visits overseas during the period in question has not been kept for all markets. The list that follows may therefore not be comprehensive.

Country	Year of visit
Saudi Arabia:
Secretary of State (then Mr. Ridley)	November 1989
President	January 1993
Minister for Energy	May 1993
Malaysia:
Minister for Energy	September 1993
Minister for Trade	September and November 1993
Singapore:
Minister for Trade (then Lord Trefgarne)	July 1990
Minister for Industry (then Lord Reay)	February 1992
Baroness Denton	May and September 1993
Minister for Trade	June and December 1993
South Africa:
Minister for Trade (then Mr. Sainsbury)	November 1991

There is no record of whether these visits included party political activities.

Tobacco

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of (a) imports of tobacco and tobacco paper and (b) exports of finished tobacco products in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: Information on the topic is regularly published by the Central Statistical Office in Business Monitor MA20, Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. Unmanufactured and manufactured tobacco are classified to headings 121 and 122 respectively of the Standard International Trade Classification, while cigarette paper is classified under headings 641.55 and 642.41.

Textiles

Sir David Knox: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give details of the lowest and highest rates of EC customs import duties for both textile and clothing products.

Mr. Needham: The common customs tariff charged on imports into the Community ranges from 0 per cent. to 17 per cent. for textiles and from 6·3 per cent. to 14 per cent. for clothing.

Hosiery Industry

Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received from the hosiery industry about the level of sock imports from Indonesia and from whom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: On 25 October the Knitting Industries Federation wrote to my Department to request action to restrict sock imports from Indonesia. The case is being evaluated and my officials will contact the federation shortly.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total of all imports of socks into the United Kingdom (category 12 of the multi-fibre arrangement) (a) in total and (b) from Indonesia, in terms of quantity, value and average price for each of the years from 1990 for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: The information that my hon. Friend has requested for multi-fibre arrangement category 12 is given in the table.

MFA category 12 imports

Bonding

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what studies his Department has made of the extent to which bonding requirements act as a barrier to exports by small and medium-sized United Kingdom companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: I am not aware of any studies made by my Department into bonding requirements on exporters. Funding bonds is a matter for the private commercial sector, but I would be interested to see details of any particular cases the hon. Member may have.

Agency Agreements

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action his Department is taking to advise United Kingdom companies of the effect of EC directives on the formalisation of agency agreements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Regulations which implement Council directive 86/653/EEC relating to self-employed commercial agents have been made and were laid before both Houses today; they come into force on 1 January 1994.

A commercial agent is a

> "self-employed intermediary who has continuing authority to negotiate the sale or purchase of goods on behalf of another person (the 'principal') or to negotiate and conclude the sale or purchase of goods on behalf of and in the name of that principal".

The regulations are designed to lay down minimum requirements governing the contracts between commercial agents and their principals. In particular, they provide the agent with additional benefits which may not currently be available under United Kingdom common law, for example the right to a written contract if he requests one. The regulations have been the subject of consultations with industry in 1987, 1990 and in June this year. A number of revisions to the regulations have been made. The major amendments are:—

(i) Applicable Law: The regulations lay down the basic rule that it is where the agent is, rather than the principal, that determines whether the regulations apply but also enable the parties to opt for the law of another member State to govern the contract.

(ii) Secondary Activities: The regulations now define the core or essential activities of a commercial agent and provide for those who do not satisfy these criteria to be excluded. Such activities would be secondary. There are specific exclusions for mail order agents and consumer credit agents.

(iii) Indemnity/Compensation: Following comments received from industry, the regulations now provide for the parties to choose either an indemnity or compensation payment upon termination of an agency contract. This will allow greater flexibility.

A cost compliance assessment on the possible costs to industry of implementing the EC directive is being made available. In addition, guidance notes will be issued in the near future, detailing what we believe is the intention behind the directive. Copies of this guidance note and the cost compliance assessment will be available from the following address:—

Consumer Affairs Division 2a
Room 325
10-18 Victoria Street
London
SW1H 0NN

Copies of the regulations themselves will be available from HMSO bookshops.

Fur

Mr. Morley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of fur and fur product exports from the United Kingdom in each year since 1984.

Mr. Needham: The available information is given in the following table.

Value of United Kingdom Exports of fur and fur products

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how his Department was represented at the test to simulate a meltdown accident at a pressurised water reactor, held in France on 3 December; and what are the implications of the results of this test in regard to the future safety of the Sizewell B power plant.

Mr. Eggar: My Department was not represented at the test carried out at Cadarache by the Commissariat a l'Engergie Atomique—the French nuclear safety R and D organisation. However, I understand that the Atomic Energy Authority is involved by means of an exchange agreement with the CEA under the nuclear safety R and D programme which is sponsored by the Health and Safety Executive. Both the HSE's nuclear installations inspectorate and Nuclear Electric will be informed of the results through the CEA-AEA agreement. It is not expected that the test will produce results which would affect the safety case prepared for Sizewell B.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Straw: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the target population set by the European Commission for objective 2 status for areas in the United Kingdom; and by what percentage of the population the list submitted by Her Majesty's Government either exceeds or falls short of their target.

Mr. Sainsbury: There is no target population set by the Commission for United Kingdom objective 2 areas. The procedure is governed by article 9 of Council Regulation 2081/93 which, among other things, sets out various statistical criteria, requires member states to propose areas, and requires the Commission to establish the list taking into account national priorities in consultation with the member state concerned.

One of the recitals to the regulation, which is not legally binding, states that objective 2

"could cover up to 15 per cent. of the Community population".

The Government's proposals for the United Kingdom amount to approximately 23·5 million population. I understand that the proposals of all member states together amount to 22·5 per cent. of the Community population. I am discussing our proposals with the Commissioner responsible. Our consultation will be governed by article 9 of the Council regulation.

Mr. Straw: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether Her Majesty's Government are differentiating between areas which had first obtained assisted area status before 1993 from those areas which have recently acquired this status, in their representations for objective 2 status.

Mr. Sainsbury: No. The Government's proposals for objective 2 are based on the criteria in article 9 of Council regulation 2081/93.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Private Health Insurance

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are claiming tax relief for private health insurance; and what proportion of these are higher rate taxpayers in (i) Great Britain and (ii) Northern Ireland.

Mr. Dorrell: It is estimated that about 350,000 people in the United Kingdom receive tax relief on their private medical insurance premiums for those aged 60 or more. About 1 per cent. are higher rate taxpayers. Separate information for Northern Ireland is not available.

Taxation

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the loss in revenue resulting from an increase in the single person's tax allowance of (a) £50, (b) £100, (c) £150, (d) £200, (e) £250 and (f) £300; and how many people would be taken out of tax in each case.

Mr. Dorrell: The estimated cost in a full year at 1994-95 income levels from the specified increases in the personal allowance and the number of people taken out of tax are given in the table.

Personal allowance	Revenue cost (£ million)	Individuals taken out of tax (thousands)
Increased by £50	320	120
Increased by £100	650	220
Increased by £150	970	330
Increased by £200	1,290	470
Increased by £250	1,610	580
Increased by £300	1,920	680

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the latest estimate of the number of (a) basic rate and (b) higher rate taxpayers; and how many taxpayers are (i) male and (ii) female;

(2) what is his latest estimate of the total number of top rate taxpayers;

(3) what is the latest estimate he has for the number of people who pay income tax at a rate of (a) 20 per cent., (b) 25 per cent. and (c) 40 per cent.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates for 1993-94 based on projections from the 1991-92 Survey of Personal Incomes are given in the table.

Millions

Taxpayers liable at	Male	Female	Total
Lower rate only	1·8	3·0	4·8
Basic rate but not higher rate	11·4	7·1	18·4
Higher rate	1·6	0·3	1·9
All taxpayers	14·8	10·3	25·1

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the current numbers of (a) corporate taxpayers and (b) income taxpayers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: About 350,000 companies pay corporation tax and 25·1 million individuals pay income tax in the United Kingdom.

Companies

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the percentage of Britain's companies that are working at full capacity.

Mr. Portillo: According to the October CBI quarterly industrial trends survey 39 per cent. of manufacturing firms were working at capacity. Estimates are not available for the whole company sector.

Students

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many students pay income tax; and what is the total number of students who pay VAT.

Mr. Dorrell: Information on the number of students who pay income tax is not available centrally and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

VAT is chargeable on a wide range of consumer expenditure and it is likely that everybody has to pay some in the course of a year.

North Sea Oil

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the total revenues to the Exchequer from North sea oil since May 1979, expressed in 1992 prices.

Mr. Dorrell: Total revenues to the Exchequer from the North sea since 1979-80 at 1992-93 prices have been £114 billion.

ECOFIN

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the most recent meeting of European Economic and Finance Ministers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Economic and Finance Council of the European Union met in Brussels on 5 December. I represented the United Kingdom.

ECOFIN discussed the Commission's recommendation for the broad guidelines for the economic policies of member states and of the Community under the new procedures of article 103 of the treaty. ECOFIN agreed a report to the European Council containing the draft guidelines. The treaty requires the European Council to agree conclusions on the basis of this report which will then be translated into a formal Council recommendation at a subsequent meeting of Finance Ministers. The recommendation will not have legally binding force.

There was a short discussion on the likely content of the Commission White Book on growth, competitiveness and employment. I said that it was unfortunate that the Commission had been unable to prepare a full draft of its White Book in time for it to be considered by the ECOFIN before the European Council. The Commission circulated the text on 6 December and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

There were no formal votes.

Privatisation (Consultants' Fees)

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide details of all fees to consultants and brokers associated with privatisation and share sales of (a) BT since 1982, (b) British Gas since 1986, (c) all regional electric companies since 1998-89, (d) all regional water companies since 1988-89 and (e) the total.

Mr. Dorrell: No. Fees paid to consultants, brokers, and so on as part of the privatisation programme are treated as commercially confidential. Total fees paid to advisers are quantified within the relevant National Audit Office reports published by the Comptroller and Auditor General. For the sales requested, the total fees paid to advisers were:

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of people employed, (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

Sir John Cope: The information requested is shown in the table. Figures are given in terms of grade levels which include equivalent grades, and reflects the position as at October 1993. The figures cover only non-industrial staff in post, exclude agency staff and are calculated on a head count basis with part-timers counted as one. The figures are based on the Department's ethnic origin questionnaire which drew a 93 per cent. response rate.

Value Added Tax

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy that value added tax will not be levied on community care transfer moneys in Scotland.

Sir John Cope: Community care transfer funds are exempt from VAT when used by recipient bodies to provide welfare services.

European Investment Fund

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, with reference to the Act to amend the statutes of the European investment bank permitting the establishment of a European investment fund—Cm 2359—approved by Parliament on 29 November, he will state (a) the maximum permitted liability of the fund in guarantees, (b) the initial contributed capital subscribed by the European Community as such, by member states, and by others respectively, (c) who will be inviting others to become members of the fund, and what qualifications they are likely to possess, (d) the limitations placed on the fund in respect of the purposes of the enterprises to which assistance is given, (e) when he expects the statutes of the fund to be decided and how and by whom they will be published and (f) who will appoint its governing body, and by what means, and to whom the person representing the interests of Her Majesty's Government on that body will be responsible.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 7 December 1993]: The rules of operation of the proposed new European Investment Fund are set out in the fund's statute. At present, this document exists only in draft form, but it will be adopted by the governors of the European investment bank immediately after they establish the fund itself. If the draft statute is adopted in the form in which it now stands, the situation would be as follows:

(a) The fund would initially be limited to providing guarantees with a total value of no more than three times the amount of its subscribed capital. Since the fund's subscribed capital is fixed at 2 billion ecu, £1·511 billion, this would mean that it could grant guarantees worth up to 6 billion ecu, £4·534 billion.

(b) It is envisaged that 40 per cent.—800 million ecu or £605 million—of the fund's initial subscribed capital would be held by the European Investment Bank, 30 per cent.—600 mecu or £453 million—by the European Community, with the remaining 30 per cent.—600 mecu or £453 million—contributed by banks and financial institutions, which operate within the Community, and which agree to become members of the fund.

(c) It is for the board of governors of the EIB to invite institutions to become members of the fund. So far as participation by banks is concerned, the EIB has approached institutions which are well established, and well known to it as clients, with invitations to take part.

(d) The fund will operate through the Community in support of small and medium-sized enterprises, and of projects which form part of trans-European networks.

(e) The statute of the fund will be adopted by the governors of the European investment bank immediately after the fund is established. Establishment, in turn, will take place as soon as the treaty amendment which enables this to happen has been ratified by all 12 EC member states. This is expected to occur early in the new year. Once the fund becomes operational it will of course publish its own statute, but in order to avoid delay it may be possible to arrange for the EIB, or the European Commission, to publish the statute in advance of this.

(f) The fund's supreme governing body will be the annual general meeting. The membership of this body will be fixed by the fund's statute, with all three classes of shareholders participating. The European Community's representative at the meeting will be one of the members of the Commission, and the EIB will be represented by its president. Both of these will be responsible for safeguarding and representing the interests of Her Majesty's Government, by virtue of the United Kingdom's position as a member state of the Community, and a shareholder in the EIB, respectively.

All figures converted at 30 November 1993 £-ecu conversion rate (£=1·3232 ecu).

Private Finance Projects

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of the 78 private finance projects listed in the appendix to the text of the Chancellor's speech to CBI Scotland's annual dinner issued on 9 September are currently under construction.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 7 December 1993]: Of the projects listed, 12 have been completed—or, in the case of services, contracts signed—and there are 17 which are under construction or for which contracts have been signed.

Personal Pensions

Mr. Denham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what action he is taking to ensure that those individuals who have been wrongly sold personal pension plans are identified and given full redress;

(2) what is his estimate of the total number of individuals who have been wrongly sold personal pension plans (a) in each of the last five years and (b) since the introduction of the Financial Services Act 1986;

(3) what is his estimate of the total value of personal pension plans that have been wrongly sold (a) in each of the last five years and (b) since the introduction of the Financial Services Act 1986.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the marketing of personal pensions.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 6 December 1993]: The responsibility for regulating the marketing of personal pensions and other investment products rests primarily with the Securities and Investments Board, as lead regulator under the Financial Services Act.

Following the intial findings of a survey commissioned in September into the selling of personal pensions to clients transferring from occupational pension schemes, the chairman of SIB has today set out the action the regulators are taking to establish the extent of any problems that may have resulted from poor compliance with the marketing rules made under the FSA; to rectify any shortcomings; and to obtain remedy for any disadvantage to investors that may have resulted.

SIB is leading this regulatory action, working closely with the other regulators concerned and with the life insurance industry to establish the extent of the problem and any financial implications for personal pension policyholders. The evidence relates to non-compliance with the regulatory standards. Further detailed work will be needed to assess whether the non-compliance has resulted in poor advice and disadvantage to investors.

I welcome this initiative, together with the actions already taken by SIB to improve the guidance on the selling of personal pensions. Should the further investigations now under way reveal that any clients have suffered financial loss as a result of bad advice, I have made it clear to SIB that the Government expect effective remedies to be put in place promptly.

Personal pensions have proved their popularity, combining as they do an opportunity for a flexible career with the security of an income in retirement.

But as with other investment products people must be able to rely on high standards of professionalism and competence on the part of salesmen and advisers, and be confident that they will not be sold products unsuitable for their requirements.

I have asked the chairman of SIB to keep me closely informed as this work develops.

WALES

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current estimate of the cost of establishing unitary authorities in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The measures in the Local Government (Wales) Bill will result in transitional costs estimated on the basis of a report prepared by consultants to be between £65 million and £150 million over 15 years. The level of these costs will depend on decisions to be taken by the new councils on such matters as staffing levels and management structures. I intend to encourage tight control of costs and believe the consultants' higher figures would be reached only if councils decide to make a large number of existing employees redundant, leading to substantial subsequent revenue savings.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. [illegible]wood: There is no average annual spend on advertising, but the figures for the two specific years 1979 and 1985, and for the lastest available year 1992-93, are as follows:

Welsh office publicity spend

£000

Year	Radio	TV	Press	Joint[1] press and TV
1979-80	Nil	—	—	61
1985-86	Nil	Nil	31	—

[1] Television and Press advertising for the years 1979-85 cannot be readily separated.

Note:

In 1992-93 it was decided to advertise the Organ Donor Scheme on TV, which accounted for £70,000 out of the £77,000.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many hospitals have closed in each of the counties of Wales since 1980.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information, which relates to hospitals which have closed since 1 January 1980 and are still closed, is given in the following table. During the same period nine hospitals were opened.

School Closures

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many schools have closed in each Welsh local education authority since 1980.

Housing Revenue Account

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the total amount of housing revenue account subsidy payable to local housing authorities in Wales in 1992-93, and his estimates for 1993-94 and 1994-95, indicating separately the housing and housing benefit components and showing the difference between the actual subsidy payable and the amount which would have been payable if expenditure on rent rebates had qualified in full for subsidy.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The available information is set out as follows. The Welsh Office is consulting authorities on subsidy proposals for 1994-95 upon which decisions have yet to be taken.

£ million

	1992-93[1] Estimated Outturn	1993-94[2] Provisional Outturn

Diabetes

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will arrange for a copy of the British Diabetic Association booklet "Recommendations for Management of Diabetes in Primary Care" to be sent to every general practitioner practice in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The British Diabetic Association has written to all family health services, as managers of primary care services, offering supplies of this booklet for distribution to GP practices. To date, I understand that three authorities in Wales—Clwyd, Powys and West Glamorgan—are arranging for copies to be distributed to practices in their area.

House Condition Survey

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the house condition survey for Wales will be published.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The results of the Welsh House Condition Survey are expected to be published in spring 1994.

Forestry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the Forestry Commission forests and woods in each of the counties of Wales.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each separate piece of land currently owned or leased by the Forestry Commission in Clwyd (a) its name, (b) its area in hectares; and if he will place a map in the Library which names and identifies each of these pieces of land.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Forestry Commission manages the following areas of land in each county in Wales.

County	Area (hectares)
Clwyd	9,457
Dyfed	31,002
Gwent	8,787
Gwynedd	27,954
Mid Glamorgan	13,038
Powys	31,292
South Glamorgan	486
West Glamorgan	14,399

Details of individual forests and woodlands are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

I have, however, made arrangements for a map showing the location of the individual areas to be placed in the Library of the House as soon as possible.

Political Adviser

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on what date, on what terms and at what cost to public funds his political adviser Hywell Williams will commence employment; if he will place a copy of his terms of reference in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Gentleman for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 4 November 1993, c. 334.

Trawsfynydd Nuclear Power Station

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he is taking to create jobs for the former workers of the Trawsfynydd nuclear power station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I have announced a range of measures, attracting Welsh Office support of over £700,000, to assist with economic development in the wake of the closure of Trawsfynydd nuclear power station. These include the funding of the project manager for the South Gwynedd Partnership; improvements to Blaenau Ffestiniog community centre; the development of land at Llanystumdwy; and land acquisition at Penamser business park at Porthmadog. I am also considering the scope to accelerate some of the more important schemes in my forward roads programme and the South Gwynedd Partnership is preparing a case for an enterprise zone in the area.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to announce the appointment of a new reviewer of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am pleased to announce that Mr. John J. Rowe QC has accepted my invitation to succeed Viscount Colville of Culross QC in carrying out the annual review of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991. Mr. Rowe is a highly respected and senior Queen's counsel who will bring considerable experience to the post.

Departmental Files

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by the Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes."

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 3-6 December 1993]: The responsibility of the National Audit Office does not extend to the six Northern Ireland Departments which have their own similarly appointed body—the Northern Ireland Audit office. There are eight files marked "Not for Northern Ireland Audit Office eyes".

The marking "Not for NIAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Department of Finance and Personnel and the Northern Ireland Audit Office under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NIAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NIAO while they are current.

There is no marking, "Not for PAC eyes".

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Sir John Wheeler: The cost of providing cars for Ministers during the 1992-93 financial year was just over £856,000. Ministers do not all have exclusive use of a car; these costs therefore include private hire cars and supplement the four cars provided by the Government car service. They also include the cost of cars provided by the Royal Ulster Constabulary for Ministers when they are in Northern Ireland.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Electricity and Gas

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chairman of the Finance and Services Committee what was the total cost of electricity and gas supplied to the Palace of Westminster in the eight current years to date; and what is his estimate of the extra costs arising from the imposition of VAT on fuel at (a) eight per cent. and (b) 17·5 per cent.

Mr. Paul Channon: Until 1 April 1992, the cost of electricity and gas supplied to the Palace of Westminster was met by the Department of the Environment. In 1992-93, the first year that fuel and utilities were met by the votes of the Houses of Parliament, gas and electricity accounted for some £740,000, of which the House of Commons paid 60 per cent. So far in the current financial year £365,000 has been spent.

No extra costs arise from the imposition of VAT on fuel as the tax is already applied in respect of commercial use.

Christmas Tree

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what was the total cost of purchasing and decorating the Christmas tree located in New Palace Yard together with the total cost of installing the tree, including the cost of crane hire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ray Powell: The Christmas tree in New Palace Yard has been presented to the House by the Forestry Commission. The cost of its installation and decoration, including labour and crane hire, was £800.

Refreshment Department

Mr. Madden: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make arrangements for any food not required each day by the Refreshment Department to be passed to suitable charities for distribution, including to the homeless.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: I have been asked to reply.

This is a matter for the Director of Catering Services.

EMPLOYMENT

Access to Work Scheme

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he will announce the upper limits on (a) help to a disabled person and (b) the contribution expected from the employer in a five-year period under his proposed access to work scheme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make an announcement as soon as possible about details of the access to work scheme, including the upper limits on (a) help to a disabled person and (b) the contribution expected from the employer in a five-year period.

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of people employed, (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

Miss Widdecombe: The figures are given in the following table:

Asbestos

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement summarising the provisions of those regulations which seek to control the use of asbestos in roofing and other building materials; and if he will indicate the means through which those regulations should be enforced.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 6 December 1993]: The Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations 1992 which came into force on 1 January 1993 impose major restrictions on the use of asbestos, including its use for some building materials. They prohibit the import, supply and use of all types of amphibole asbestos, including corcidolite—blue asbestos—and amosite—brown asbestos—the two forms most commonly associated with asbestos-related disease. The regulations also prohibit asbestos spraying and the installation of asbestos insulation and a range of building products containing chrysotile—white asbestos—including low-density insulating and sound-proofing materials and roofing felt.

The Control of Asbestos at Work (Amendment) Regulations 1992 which came into force on 1 January 1993 include a requirement for the substitution of products containing asbestos when practicable and provided the alternative creates a lesser risk.

The regulations are enforced by Health and Safety Executive inspectors, and local authority inspectors who have powers under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases have been identified by the appropriate enforcement authorities in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available, of the use of asbestos materials in building and roofing work contrary to the relevant regulations.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 6 December 1993]: The information requested is not available. However, the figures in the following tables show the numbers of informations laid and the number of convictions secured in the construction industry, under the Asbestos Regulations 1969 and the Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1987, as amended, which replaced them. The Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations cover all work with asbestos. There were no informations laid during the period under the Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations 1985 or the Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations 1992.

Notes:

1. The figures above include informations laid and convictions for those in the construction industry involved in asbestos stripping.
2. The Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1987 came into force on 1 March 1988.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to ensure compliance with regulation 8(1A) of the Control of Asbestos at Work (Amendment) Regulations 1992 and with its associated approved code of practice; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Regulation 8(1A) of the Control of Asbestos (Amendment) Regulations 1992 has been in force since 1 January 1993. Health and Safety Executive inspectors and local authority inspectors enforce these provisions. At their visits to workplaces, inspectors give high priority to encouraging the use of asbestos substitutes as the principal means of preventing any exposure to asbestos whenever this is appropriate.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if the Health and Safety Commission will review the effectiveness of the regulations governing the use of asbestos products in roofing and other building work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Current regulations governing the use of asbestos products in roofing and other building work are considered to be effective with regard to the protection of the health of workers and the public. There are no plans at present to extend them, but, in common with other health and safety legislation, there is an ongoing process of monitoring and review by the Health and Safety Commission.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received concerning the effectiveness of the regulations governing the use of asbestos products in roofing and other building work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 6 December 1993]: The letter from my hon. Friend, dated 24 November 1993, addressed to me is the only representation received on this matter.

North Norfolk Action

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer of 29 November, Official Report, columns 355-56, if he will estimate the savings on benefits incurred due to persons leaving the unemployment register after interviews and to persons obtaining employment after participating in the North Norfolk Action scheme, stating the number in each case and the percentage this represents in each case to the number engaged on the scheme; what was the overall expenditure on North Norfolk Action up to 31 October; how much expenditure has been incurred on (a) provider fees, (b) extra allowances, (c) fares to work, (d) publicity, (e) evaluation and (f) Employment Service running costs, showing overall figures and how the provider fees and extra allowances were arrived at; and what is the net saving to the public funds which has resulted from the first six months of North Norfolk Action.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Sir Ralph Howell, dated 8 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question about the savings on benefits incurred due to persons leaving the unemployment register after interviews and to persons obtaining employment after participating in the North Norfolk Action Scheme, stating the number in each case and the percentage this represents in each case to the number engaged on the scheme; what was the overall expenditure on North Norfolk Action up to 31 October; how much expenditure has been incurred on (a) provider fees, (b) extra allowances, (c) fares to work, (d) publicity, (e) evaluation and (f) employment service running costs showing overall figures and how the provider fees and extra allowances were arrived at; and what is the net saving to the public funds which has resulted from the first six months of North Norfolk Action.

Up to 31 October 16 people had found work following participation on the North Norfolk Action programme which represents 13·3 per cent. of all participants. The number leaving the register to go into work following Supportive Caseload interviews was 120 representing 35 per cent. of all those given such interviews.

Overall expenditure on North Norfolk Action which had been brought to account by 31 October was £205,182. This was made up as follows:

(a) Provider fees—£87,349.
1,770 trainee weeks at £49·34 (average cost) per week.

(b) Allowances—£85,178.
741 payments (made fortnightly) × £114·94 (average fortnightly payment: represents £47·47 plus £10 per week).
This does not include other payments such as Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit etc., which are not paid by the Employment Service.

(c) Fares to work—£2,455.

(d) Publicity—£1,500.

(e) Evaluation—Work to start in 1994.

(f) Running costs—£28,700.

It is not yet possible to estimate what, if any, benefit savings have resulted from North Norfolk Action. This is because such savings would be achieved only if people leave unemployment quicker than they would have otherwise have done, but without displacing others, and remain out of unemployment for longer. These effects can be estimated only when we have the full results of our planned evaluation. An evaluation exercise of supportive caseload is being conducted by my Research and Evaluation Branch and external contractors will shortly be appointed to assess the effects of participation in North Norfolk Action. Results should be available during 1994.

Nor is it possible to make an estimate of the net effect of North Norfolk Action on the exchequer. For example this would require information about how expenditure on North Norfolk Action might have affected unemployment if it had been used in other ways.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Trawsfynydd Power Station

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the defuelling process will be completed at the Trawsfynydd nuclear power station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

This is a matter for Nuclear Electric plc subject to the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorates's requirements as to safety.

HEALTH

Concorde (Staff Flights)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the use of Concorde flights by health staff.

Mr. Sackville: Information about the use of Concorde by NHS staff is not collected centrally. We expect health staff to make proper and economic use of public funds when travelling at public expense.

NHS Senior Managers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will order the chairmen of all health authorities to initiate action to recover all irregular severance payments to NHS senior managers;

(2) when she expects to be able to present to Parliament a report on investigations into irregular payments to and by NHS senior managers.

Dr. Mawhinney: Health authorities are required to make payments in accordance with their statutory powers.

If any payments are found to be irregular we would expect health authorities to consider, in the light of legal advice, to what extent they are recoverable. We supply to the Public Accounts Committee such information as they require following reports from the Comptroller and Auditor General giving cause to do so.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will request the Audit Commission to make a special audit report on the regularity of severance payments to senior managers.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

GP Fundholders

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners expressed an interest in fundholding and received the start-up management and then did not proceed to become a fundholder in 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information for 1990-91 is not available. A total of 310 practices expressed an interest in becoming fundholders in 1991-92 with 253 joining the scheme the following April. Six hundred and sixty-eight practices expressed an interest in 1992-93 with 580 joining the following April. Practices are reimbursed for the additional expenditure involved in preparing to manage a fund.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Sackville: There are five cars and the basic projected annual cost for the current financial year is £253,626.

Respite Care

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many families with children with disabilities have received respite care in each year since 1990; and what are the proposed figures for 1993.

Mr. Bowis: Information about the number of children receiving respite care was first collected centrally, following the implementation of the Children Act 1989, for the period 14 October 1991 to 31 March 1992. No information is collected centrally on the number of families. It is estimated that the number of children with disabilities looked after in England who received respite care during this period, specifically because their parents need relief from problems of stress of caring for them was 2,500.

The decision to offer respite care is a matter for local authorities. Information for the year ending 31 March 1993 is not yet available centrally.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to increase the number of respite carers for families of children with disabilities.

Mr. Bowis: Plans for respite services are a matter for local authority social services departments, according to local need, resources and priorities.

Guy's and Lewisham NHS Trust

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was paid to Peter Griffiths, former chief executive of the Guy's and Lewisham NHS trust, upon his departure from that post.

Dr. Mawhinney: Mr. Griffiths is still employed by the Lewisham National Health Service Trust, which is the successor authority to the Guy's and Lewisham NHS Trust.

NHS Trusts (Salaries)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance she has issued, or is planning to issue, to NHS trusts, regarding pay norms for 1994-95.

Dr. Mawhinney: There is no pay norm in 1994-95.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been issued to trust boards, regarding the need to observe a limit on pay rises for trust employees for the current year.

Dr. Mawhinney: On 12 November 1992, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the chairmen of all health service employing bodies setting out arrangements for restraining public sector pay in the coming year. On 20 January 1993, the chief executive of the National Health Service Management Executive also wrote to general managers and chief executives giving guidance on the application of this policy.

Copies of both letters are available in the Library.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in her Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The number of press and publicity officers currently employed is as follows:

Press —13 full time

Publicity—20 full time and 1 part time

Publicity officers are responsible for devising, developing, managing and monitoring a wide range of paid publicity campaigns to further the health promotion and other aims of the Department and the national health service. They are professional buyers of all forms of publicity, for example, advertising, videos, publications and research using around 300 different suppliers.

Information for the years 1979 and 1985 is not available in the form requested.

Human Corpses

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her Department's policy towards the use by hospitals or medical research institutes of human corpses for scientific research into road accidents.

Mr. Sackville: Bodies may be donated to licensed medical schools, either in accordance with donors' wishes or when the family has agreed, under the terms of the Anatomy Act 1984. This Act makes provision for the use of such bodies for the purposes of anatomical examination, which is defined in the Act as examination by dissection for the purposes of teaching or studying or researching into morphology, that is, the study of the form—anatomy—of the body. This precludes the use of such bodies for scientific research into road accidents.

The Human Tissue Act 1961, which in specified circumstances and subject to the consent of the donor permits the use of bodies or parts of bodies for therapeutic purposes or for the purposes of medical education or research, does not preclude the use of bodies for medical research into road accidents.

However, many people will regard the placing of bodies in cars which are then crashed, which is reported to have happened in other countries, as unacceptable as part of medical research. Local research ethics committees, which would have to consider any proposed medical research into road accidents, would be expected to take this viewpoint into account.

Myodil

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she is taking to help those suffering from arachnoiditis following treatment by Myodil used in spinal investigations to claim compensation from Glaxo; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The Medicines Control Agency complied with a High Court order for discovery of documents relating to Myodil in 1991, but has had no further involvement. Myodil has not been marketed since 1987 when it was withdrawn by its manufacturer.

Broadmoor

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received relating to the extent of racism at Broadmoor; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: We have received no specific representations about racism at Broadmoor hospital, but we recognise, as does the Special Hospitals Service Authority, the importance of ensuring that the needs of black and other ethnic minority patients both there and in the other special hospitals receive proper attention. The recent report of the inquiry into the death of Mr. Orville Blackwood while a patient at Broadmoor made a number of recommendations directed to this. The report was welcomed by the SHSA, which will be reporting to me under the accountability review procedure on progress in implementing the recommendations. Broadmoor hospital has already introduced a strategy for improving services for black and other ethnic minority patients and has appointed a consultant to help establish closer links with relevant community and support organisations. Copies of the report are available in the Library.

Waltham Forest District Health Authority

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals she has received relating to Waltham Forest from (a) the London initiative zone and (b) the London implementation group; and what is the estimated cost of each.

Dr. Mawhinney: Waltham Forest has submitted to the London Implementation Group, primary health care development plans for the years 1993-94 and 1994-95. The plans contain proposals for improving Waltham Forest's primary care infrastructure and for developing innovative practice in primary and community care. The estimated cost of the 1993-94 and 1994-95 proposals is £5 million.

Health Benefit Claims

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1), pursuant to her answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 301, on the low income scheme, how many applications in 1992-93 for health benefits were (a) incorrectly filled in and returned to the claimant and (b) not successful in receiving help towards the item claimed; and what is the average financial help awarded to the claimants;

(2) if she will publish the proposals made by the review into health benefits in respect of reforming or simplifying the AG1 claim form.

Dr. Mawhinney: Proposals for simplifying the national health service low income scheme claim form AG1 remain under consideration. Implementation of any changes will be discussed with those who contributed to the review, including the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, before they are introduced. During 1992-93, approximately 18 per cent. of all claim forms were returned to the claimant for additional information or clarification. Full or partial help was offered on each completed claim form except for 3,000 where a capital holding in excess of £8,000 precluded an award. It is not possible to quantify the average financial help awarded. Holders of low income scheme certificates are entitled to receive national health service services free or at a reduced cost as and when these are needed during the currency of a certificate; they do not receive a specified financial award.

Hospital Admissions

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of patients admitted so far in 1993 to hospitals in Berkshire as (a) emergency and (b) non-emergency cases were registered at (i) fund-holding and (ii) non-fund-holding general practices.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Richard Eassie, the chairman of Berkshire health authority, for details.

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many consultants have been suspended in each of the last 15 years; and how many from each year are still under suspension by regional health authority, district health authority and provider unit.

Dr. Mawhinney; This information is not available centrally.

Self-medication

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimates she has made of the savings possible from her initiative to encourage self-medication.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

GPs

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of patients deregistered by their general practitioners in each of the past five years, nationally and by region.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

NHS Psychogeriatric Care Beds

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration she has given to the report, "NHS Psychogeriatric Continuing Care Beds" published by the Alzheimer's Disease Society, copies of which have been sent to her Department; what action she is taking; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: The report, which makes a number of recommendations for Government action, will be given full and careful consideration.

NHS Sight Tests

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations she has had with optometrists concerning the level of expenses to be included in the NHS sight test fee for 1993-94.

Dr. Mawhinney: The optometrists have been consulted as normal, through the established Whitley machinery, about the level of the national health service sight test fee.

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amount of the current NHS sight test fee is attributable to the reimbursement of optometrists' expenses.

Dr. Mawhinney: The national health service sight test fee contains both a remuneration and expenses element. These components are not separately identifiable.

Estates Information Systems Group

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the responsibilities and terms of reference of the national health service estates information systems group;

(2) when the national health service estates information systems group was established; and to whom it reports.

Mr. Sackville: The group was established on 1 April 1992 and is part of National Health Service Estates, an executive agency of the Department of Health. It provides services to the NHS and other clients on a range of estates information systems and software products on a recover of cost basis. It also contributes to reducing the net cost of the agency's services by marketing activity. As part of the agency it is accountable to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff the national health service estates information systems group employs; and what has been its annual budget since it was established, in the current year and its projected annual budgets.

Mr. Sackville: The group employs 16 full-time staff. Since the group was established its annual budgets have been:—

	£ million
1992-93	1·5
1993-94	1·6

As the service is provided on a recovery of cost basis, projected annual budgets will be in line with anticipated demands for its services.

Mentally Ill People (Housing)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many active clients the four mental health teams have set up under the homeless mentally ill initiative; and of these, how many have moved into potentially permanent accommodation;

(2) if she will list for each of the four mental health teams set up under the homeless mentally ill initiative (a) the number of active clients, (b) how many have moved into potentially permanent accommodation and (c) how many clients were lost.

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 2 December 1993]: The four community psychiatric teams set up under the homeless mentally ill initiative, for which figures are available, have had continuing contact over a period of time, with 1,222 clients; 301 of these have moved into potentially permanent accommodation.

These figures are broken down by each of the teams in the table, which also shows the number of clients lost.

	Clients	Potentially permanent accommodation	Lost
Focus team (Bloomsbury and Islington)	280	100	30
Mental health team (South East London)	349	102	28
Joint homelessness team (Westminster)	443	66	92
HELP team (East London and City)	150	33	32
Totals	1,222	301	182

Notes:

1. The figures provided by the FOCUS team are estimates.
2. A fifth team set up for Kensington and Chelsea has been running for less than one year. Valid data for this team are not yet available.
3. The category 'potentially permanent accommodation' has not been taken to include the hostels which have been set up under the HMI.
4. The exact definition of 'client' varies between teams.

The figures indicate that the HMI has been very successful in making contact with this vulnerable group of people and bringing a significant proportion of them into care.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people entered a registered care home under the homeless mentally ill initiative (a) before and (b) after April 1993.

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 2 December 1993]: Some homeless mentally ill initiative hostels have been set up as residential care homes. These hostels admitted 33 homeless mentally ill people before April 1993 and 27 after that date. In addition 49 homeless mentally ill people identified by the HMI community psychiatric teams entered other residential care homes before April 1993 and 19 after that date.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many units of permanent accommodation have been provided as part of the homeless mentally ill initiative announced in July 1990.

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 2 December 1993]: We have funded up to 150 specialist short-stay hostel places: five hostels are already open providing 61 places. More hostels are being developed.

Negotiations are currently taking place with interested parties, including the Housing Corporation, over the provision of permanent places to accommodate homeless mentally ill people in London.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Regina v. Brown

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will place a transcript of the Regina v. Brown appeal in the Library; and whether the case is being sent to further appeal.

The Attorney-General: No transcript of the judgment of the Court of Appeal is yet available.

The Director of Public Prosecutions has invited the Court of Appeal to certify that a point of general public importance arises in relation to the meaning to be attached to the word "use" when applied to personal data within section 5 of the Data Protection Act 1984, and to grant leave to appeal on this point to the House of Lords. It is expected that the matter will be listed in the Court of Appeal before Christmas 1993 in order that the court may consider the application made by the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Attorney-General how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

The Attorney-General: The expenditure on press advertising by the Departments for which I am responsible in the financial year 1992-93 was £330,360. Corresponding figures for 1979-80 and 1985-86 can be provided only at disproportionate cost. There was no expenditure on either television or radio advertising in any of the years in question.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Attorney-General how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

The Attorney-General: There are currently eight full-time and one part-time press and publicity officers employed in the Departments for which I am responsible. There were no such officers employed in 1985 or 1979.

Jonathan Goldberg QC

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney-General if the Serious Fraud Office intends to refer the conduct of Jonathan Goldberg QC in the Levitt case to the Bar Council.

The Attorney-General: No. I understand that the matter has already been referred to the Bar Council.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. David Davis: The Cabinet Office has no "sensitive documents unit". However, all Cabinet Office records are reviewed for continuing sensitivity in the period before their release by a team of up to four part-time reviewers who form part of the Cabinet Office records section. Records are reviewed in accordance with the guidelines contained in chapter 9 of the Open Government White Paper (Cmnd. 2290) of July 1993. Records that are withheld are subject to regular re-review. Approximately 100 linear feet of records are dealt with during a year.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. David Davis: Expenditure by the Office of Public Service and Science on press advertising in the last financial year was £608,957, of which £589,838 was incurred in connection with the citizens charter. There was no expenditure in this period on television or radio advertising.

The corresponding information for 1985 and 1979 is not available in the form requested.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. David Davis: During 1992-93, the charge to the Office of Public Service and Science for use of the Government Car Service by its departmental Ministers and the Government Whips was £420,088.

Cloud Research

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what help he gives to encourage research (a) on how clouds modulate the climate system, (b) on cloud radiation problems and (c) on cloud profiling radar.

Mr. David Davis: The Government make funds available under the science budget to the research councils, which determine their priorities in accordance with the terms of their royal charters. Such research is supported by the Natural Environment Research Council and the Science and Engineering Research Council.

The NERC is paying specific attention to these matters through a special topic called "Clouds, Aerosols and Radiation", at a total cost of £733,000. It is also supporting four training awards and four research grants, at a total estimated cost of approximately £700,000.

The SERC has assisted in some preliminary studies for a spaceborne profiling radar, as a contribution to the global energy and water experiment of the world climate research programme. It is not possible to disaggregate the cost of this work from other SERC operations.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Mink Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many mink farms have operated in each county in England in each year since 1984; and what is the current figure.

Mr. Soames: Information is readily available only for the last five years. The number of licensed mink farms in England by county, from 1989 to 1993, is shown in the table.

Fur Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what animals other than mink or Arctic fox are kept on fur farms in the United Kingdom; what county or region they are in; what number of each particular animal are kept; and what is the minimum statutory cage size for the particular animals concerned.

Mr. Soames: No information is kept on the numbers or locations of particular species kept for fur farming except in respect of mink in the United Kingdom and Arctic foxes in Northern Ireland. There is no legislation governing the minimum cage size for fur-bearing animals.

Rare Breeds

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps her Department is taking to assess the effectiveness of rare breeds in conservation grazing schemes, with particular reference to the Hebridean sheep; and if she will study the means by which set-aside arrangements can be adjusted to help conserve rare breeds and control pernicious weeds.

Mr. Jack: Our current research on conservation grazing does not include any work specific to Hebridean or other rare breeds of sheep. However a recent change to the EC set-aside rules has introduced the possibility of limited grazing of set-aside land in the autumn, including grazing by rare breeds.

Incinerators

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list the incinerators in the north-west licensed to incinerate BSE-infected cattle and scrapie-infected sheep; and how many such carcases were destroyed in each of the last 12 months at each incinerator.

Mr. Soames: Incinerators are not specifically licensed for this purpose. One incinerator plant in the north-west in Derbyshire has held a contract with the Ministry for the disposal of carcases of cattle suspected of being affected with BSE since 1 July 1993. Specific information relating to this incineration plant as with all others contracted to the Ministry is classed as commercial-in-confidence.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress her Department is making to implement measures to conform to EC

Regulation 2078/92 regarding premium payments for the preservation of rare breeds of domestic animals; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 7 December 1993]: Our proposals for implementing EC regulation 2078/92 are based on a careful assessment of environmental priorities and the needs of the countryside. They do not include premium payments for the preservation of rare breeds of domestic animals but do include measures which will benefit local breeds such as, for example, Exmoor ponies in the case of the Exmoor environmentally sensitive area.

Potatoes

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is her estimate of the tonnage of (a) seed potatoes of each variety and (b) ware potatoes by market description growing in England and Wales in (i) 1992 and (ii) 1993; what tonnages of each were sold for (x) home and (y) foreign seeds, and for human consumption by category; and what was the estimate made in 1992 in each case.

Mr. Jack: The total amount of certified seed grown in England and Wales in 1992 was 35,000 tonnes. A breakdown by variety is given in the table. For 1993 the estimate is 48,000 tonnes, but no varietal split is yet available. However, a breakdown by area grown is given in the table:

Agricultural Tenancy

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations she has received on reform of the law relating to agricultural tenancy; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: Since we published proposals for reform in February 1991, my right hon. Friend has received around 300 representations, almost all of which have expressed support for reform of the kind proposed.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much her Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Jack: Expenditure on advertising by MAFF in the financial years 1985-86 and 1992-93 was as follows:

	(a) TV	(b) Radio	(c) Press
1985-86	nil	nil	£29,000
1992-93	£475,000	nil	£19,000

Figures prior to 1982-83 are not available in this form since they do not distinguish between expenditure on advertising and other paid publicity.

Sheep Dip

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations she has received over the past 12 months on the use of organophosphate sheep dip; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The Minister has received a number of representations over the past 12 months on the use of organophosphate sheep dip. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) on 1 December.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in her Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Jack: The number of press and publicity officer currently employed by MAFF is 33. The corresponding figure for 1985 is 30. A figure for 1979 is not readily available.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether she has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Jack: The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government Departments including MAFF, are stated in the HMG IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method and baseline security for IT systems risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the HMG IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation in some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

Fishing Licences

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fishing licences have been issued in England and Wales to (a) under 10 m vessels and (b) over 10 m vessels up to the most recently available date.

Mr. Jack: As at 1 December some 3,900 10 m and under licences had been approved, or were likely to be approved, for issue to fishing vessel owners in England and Wales. There were some 1,690 licensed vessels over 10 m in overall length in the English and Welsh fleet.

Animals (Transit)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will indicate how many animals were found at ports to be unfit to travel further in (a) 1992 and (b) so far in 1993.

Mr. Soames: In 1992 the number of farm animals inspected at portal lairages in Great Britain and found unfit for their international journey was 28,070. Since 1 January this year veterinary inspection of animals for journeys extending beyond United Kingdom territory has been carried out at the point of origin. Numbers of animals so inspected and found to be unfit for their journey are not recorded centrally.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many letters she has received from members of the public indicating that they have seen unsatisfactory treatment of animals in transit so far this year; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: Very few representations are received giving first-hand accounts of unsatisfactory treatment of animals in transit. The great majority of the letters received about the transport of animals are the result of general campaigns by animal welfare organisations.

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations have been received on the subject of the transportation of live animals since 1 November.

Mr. Soames: Since 1 November the Government have received nearly 17,000 pieces of correspondence, and 10 petitions representing 740 signatures, on the transportation of animals.

Ministers (Foreign Visits)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list the Ministers in her Department who since June 1987 have visited (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malaysia, *(c)*Singapore and (d) South Africa on official business; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

Mr. Jack: In 1988 the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food my right hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor) visited Malaysia and Singapore, in 1991 the Minister of State, Baroness Trumpington visited Saudi Arabia and in 1992 the Parliamentary Secretary, Earl Howe, visited South Africa on official business. None of these visits included party political activities.

Fishing (Prosecutions)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many prosecutions there have been since 1988 under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts in respect of vessels that fish for profit in England and Wales.

Mr. Jack: Two owners of vessels in England and Wales have been prosecuted for fishing for profit while unregistered under the Merchant Shipping Act 1988.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment she has made of the extent of the unlicensed dumping of toxic waste off the coast of south Wales.

Mr. Jack: I have no information concerning any illegal dumping of toxic waste off the coast of south Wales. If the hon. Member has suspicions that such an operation is taking or has taken place I would welcome any details he may have and I will arrange for the matter to be fully investigated.

Badger Setts

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many licences have been granted to disturb badger setts in each of the last five years; and where were the setts concerned.

Mr. Soames: Legislation requiring the issue of licences to allow interference with badger setts came into force in October 1991. The first licences were issued in February 1992 and the number issued since for each of the Ministry's regions is as follows:

	February to December 1992	January to October 1993
Northern Region	1	1
North East Region	5	3
North Mercia Region	28	18
South Mercia Region	13	19
East Midlands Region	11	11
Anglia Region	4	3
South East Region	18	25
Wessex Region	56	105
South West Region	18	23
Total	154	208

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement about the link between badgers and tuberculosis in cattle generally, and in the south-west of England in particular, and about her Department's response to the prevalence of TB breakdowns.

Mr. Soames: Tuberculosis in cattle in some areas and particularly in the south-west of England remains a worrying problem. It has serious implications for animal health and for those farmers who have disease breakdowns in their herds. In the south-west of England this year there have been 197 new confirmed breakdowns up until the end of November, significantly exceeding 121 for 1992 as a whole.

Two independent inquiries have looked into the question of bovine TB and concluded that one of the significant factors is the reservoir of infection in the wild badger population. The second enquiry by Professor Dunnet in 1986 recommended that the Department develop a diagnostic test to detect TB infection in the live badger. This has now been done and the test has been evaluated in field conditions.

The results were presented to a meeting of the consultative panel on badgers and bovine tuberculosis which met on 18 November. While the panel was not unanimous in its views on the way forward, there was general recognition that the Government needed to address the increased incidence of badger-related TB breakdowns. Agriculture Ministers have taken into account the views expressed at the meeting and have decided to set in place an action programme of six measures:

1. research to develop effective vaccines for TB in badgers;
2. research to develop new or improved diagnostic tests for the presence of infection in cattle and badgers;
3. continued monitoring of infection in the wild badger population where appropriate;
4. continued support for research into ways of avoiding transmission of disease from badgers to cattle;
5. co-operation with university departments on proposed studies on the effects of badger removal operations on the badger population and its impact on the subsequent spread of disease within the badger population; and importantly,
6. a trial of a new badger control strategy based on the application of the test for tuberculosis in the live badger.

The trial will be undertaken in the areas of the south-west of England which have the greatest disease problem. The trial will have to run for at least five years to generate scientifically valid results and will look at the effect on the incidence of TB in cattle in the areas surrounding the farm where a TB breakdown occurs.

There will be three approaches: no action at all against badgers where the farmer who has suffered the herd breakdown decides that no action should be taken; the application of the existing strategy of trapping and killing badgers on the farm or part of the farm were the disease outbreak occurrred; and finally, in about half the high-risk areas, an extension beyond the farm to apply the live test and to trap and test badgers on neighbouring farms. The trapping and testing will be carried out on a sett-by-sett basis: where a sett is found to contain one or more badgers positive to TB in the test then the positive badgers and any other badgers caught from that sett will be killed. Setts which test negative will not be disturbed. As in the current strategy no action will be taken if there is no evidence to suggest that the original breakdown in the cattle herd was related to badgers. Agriculture Ministers have also decided to continue the existing policy of not killing any lactating sows which are trapped because of the resulting impact on the cubs which are dependent on her.

In areas outside the trial the existing arrangements will continue which will mean that no action will be taken against badgers on any farm in those areas where there has been a tuberculosis breakdown unless it has been specifically sanctioned by a sub-Committee of the consultative panel on badgers and bovine tuberculosis.

I will be depositing a note in the Library of the House today.

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list for each civil service grade in her Department (a) the total number of people employed, (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

Mr. Jack: The information set out in the table as at 1 October 1993 relates to non-industrial staff in MAFF and its agencies and is derived from responses to a voluntary questionnaire completed by 95 per cent. of staff.

The figures are given by grade equivalent and include all permanent staff, excluding casuals. Part-time staff are counted as one. These figures do not include staff who have classified themselves as "other ethnic minority" when responding to the questionnaire.

Equine Viral Arteritis

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps she is taking to combat and eliminate equine viral arteritis; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: I am meeting representatives of the equine industry on Thursday 9 December in order to discuss possible action that might be taken to combat future outbreaks of the disease.

Mink

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which type of premises other than fur farms are licensed to keep mink; how many of each type of premises there are; and where they are.

Mr. Soames: For the period 1 April 1992 to 31 March 1993, the most recent for which information is available, licences to keep mink on premises other than a fur farm have been issued to a wildlife centre in Staffordshire and a country park in Lancashire.

Wages Board

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will place in the Library the responses to the consultation on the future of the Agricultural wages board.

Mr. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 3 December 1993]: Copies of all the responses to the consultation have been placed in the Library of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and are available to public scrutiny.

I am still considering the responses to the consultation. Once I have reached conclusion, a summary of the responses will be made available in the Library of the House.

ENVIRONMENT

Ozone Working Group (Montreal Protocol)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what decisions were taken at the meeting of the Ozone working group of the parties to the Montreal protocol held in Bangkok from 8 to 9 November; and what assessment he has made of the effect on halon production and use in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Yeo: The fifth meeting of the parties to the Montreal protocol took place in Bangkok from 17 to 19 November. The main issue at the meeting was replenishment of the protocol's multilateral fund, and it was agreed that the fund's budget for 1994-96 should be $510 million, which, after taking account of uncommitted resources, implies a $455 million replenishment.

It was also agreed that there should be no continued production of halons in developed countries in 1994 to meet essential uses. This means that there will be no production or supply of new halons in the United Kingdom in 1994.

Durham (Boundary Commission Inquiry)

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the estimated costs of reopening the Boundary Commission inquiry into County Durham; what is the estimated cost to local authorities in Durham; and what additional finance he will make available to them.

Mr. Baldry: The resources which we are making available to the Local Government Commission, £5·124 million in 1993-94 and £8·300 million in 1994-95, should be adequate to enable it to complete all the reviews of local government structure in the shire counties of England by the end of 1994. My right hon. Friend has announced proposals for the arrangements for any start-up costs of local government reorganisation incurred by authorities in 1994-95.

Council Tax

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice his Department has given to local authorities regarding computer systems for operating the council tax.

Mr. Baldry: To assist authorities in specifying the requirements of their computer systems to their suppliers, the Department has funded the production of a council tax requirement specification which was distributed to authorities in March 1992. The Department has also produced detailed guidance on the operation of the tax in the form of nine practice notes and a continuing series of implementation letters.

Homelessness

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with organisations that look after homeless people in (a) London and (b) other major cities of the United Kingdom as to what help his Department will be giving to such organisations during the Christmas and new year period; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: As part of the Government's rough sleepers initiative, £1·5 million has been allocated to fund seven cold weather shelters in central London this winter. These will provide around 360 bed spaces, open from 1 December to 31 March, for people who would otherwise spend the winter months sleeping on the streets of the capital. A further 280 beds are also available at short notice in the event of particularly severe weather. My officials have been in regular contact with the voluntary sector since July to plan this and to ensure that the programme proceeds smoothly.

In England—the extent of the Department of the Environment's remit—outside central London, housing responsibility for all homeless people properly rests with local authorities, who should include within their housing strategies measures to meet the accommodation needs of people sleeping rough on the streets. To complement these measures the Department is paying £6·45 million in grants this year to over 170 projects around the country run by voluntary organisations to prevent and relieve homelessness.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of elderly homeless people at risk in central London who do not have access to suitable accommodation.

Sir George Young: The most recent count, undertaken by the voluntary sector in June 1993, found nearly 360 people sleeping rough in central London, of whom about 40 were believed to be aged over 60. Most of these older rough sleepers had been on the streets for at least five years. They will have received several offers of accommodation and resettlement support under the Government's rough sleepers initiative in central London, which will continue for a further two years.

Community Care

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has to support the view that the measures contained in the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 which allow social services authorities to sponsor individual residents of housing association homes will eliminate the need for special needs management allowance and transitional special needs management allowance.

Sir George Young: Local authorities have long had the power to sponsor clients placed in homes run by housing associations. One of the basic rules of the Housing Corporation's distribution of the resources available for revenue grants to such homes has been that Exchequer grant should not be paid in cases where clients are sponsored by their social services authority. To help with the introduction of the new community care arrangements, however, the Government agreed with the Housing Corporation that for the current financial year this "sponsorship" rule should be relaxed. No decisions have been taken yet about the arrangements beyond this financial year, but before they are taken we will take into account the representations which housing associations and others have made about this issue.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has given to the findings contained in the report of the National Federation of Housing Associations, "Funding of Registered Care Homes", a copy of which has been sent to him.

Sir George Young: I plan to meet the chairman and director of the NFHA later this month to discuss the issues raised in its report.

Local Government Review

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the teacher trade unions with regard to their employment conditions in the light of the local government review.

Mr. Baldry: We have received no direct representations from the teacher trade unions, but I have discussed with the Trade Union Congress's local government committee the implications of the review for local government employees in general.

Environmental Reports

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue his reports on (a) the third annual review of progress on "This Common Inheritance", (b) sustainable development, (c) biodiversity and (d) climate change; and if he will ensure that each report is issued separately for consideration by Parliament.

Mr. Yeo: Regarding publication of the Government's sustainable development strategy for the United Kingdom and the other documents following the earth summit at Rio, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) on 2 December 1993, at column 656. The third report in the series, "This Common Inheritance", which will take account of the strategy, will be published shortly afterwards. We shall lay the documents before the House in the normal way.

Climate Change Convention

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements have been made for the ratification by the United Kingdom, before the end of 1993, of the climate change convention.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mr. Booth) on 3 December, Official Report, column 764.

Disabled Facilities

Sir John Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to put an upper limit on disabled facilities grants; what the limit will be; and if it will include value added tax and professional fees.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) on 3 November 1993, Official Report, column 206. The £20,000 limit will apply to all mandatory renovation grants, including grants for disabled facilities, for which applications are submitted to local authorities on or after 14 January 1994.

The limit is inclusive of any VAT chargeable on works carried out and professional fees and other ancillary costs incurred by applicants in undertaking grant-aided works. However, works qualifying for mandatory disabled facilities grant are zero rated for VAT purposes.

There is no limit to the size of discretionary disabled facilities grants given by local authorities under part VIII of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

The Solent

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to lay before the House the revised regulations and designated sites for the Solent under the Ramsar convention.

Mr. Yeo: We are waiting for detailed proposals from English Nature for the listing of Southampton Water and the Solent as a Ramsar site.

Environmental Assessment Summit

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department will participate in the international summit on environmental assessment, to be held in Quebec city in June 1994.

Mr. Yeo: Yes.

Global Warming

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research he is grant-aiding in relation to the vertical and horizontal measurements of the distribution of greenhouse gases in his global warming programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Global atmospheric research is detailed in "Department of the Environment Global Atmosphere Research Programme 1992-93, Contract Information Schedules", copies of which have been placed in the Library. The research programme includes measurements of the vertical distribution of ozone, monitoring of a range of greenhouse gases, including a contribution to the international global atmospheric gases experiment, and modelling studies of greenhouse gas distribution. The work is carried out in collaboration with the atmospheric sciences programme of the Natural Environment Research Council and is aimed at improving the representation of greenhouse gases in climate models of the Department's climate prediction programme at the Hadley centre, Bracknell.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations his Department received on the consultation exercise on THORP before 4 October; how many of them were in favour of THORP going ahead and how many against; and if he will summarise the conclusions of the exercise.

Mr. Yeo: About 42,500 responses were received during the consultation exercise. They are still being assessed. Detailed information about the responses will be made available once they have all been considered.

Nitrogen Dioxide Monitoring Stations

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) of 1 December, Official Report, columns 1034-35, what are the precise locations of the nitrogen dioxide monitoring stations.

Mr. Yeo: The Department of the Environment which monitors nitrogen dioxide continuously at 21 stations. These are located as follows:

Merseyside Housing

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many grants for house improvement grants were awarded in the five Merseyside boroughs last year; how many applications are outstanding; what representations his Department has received about targeting resources for house improvements and the redesignation of districts as housing action areas; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Figures showing the number of house renovation grants paid in the Knowsley, Liverpool, St. Helens, Sefton and Wirral local authority areas in 1992 and for the first half of 1993 under the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 and under the Housing Act 1985 are in the quarterly publication "Local Housing Statistics", issues No. 107, tables 3(a) and 3(b). Figures for the first half of 1993 are provisional. A copy of the publication is in the Library.

The Department does not collect data on the number of house renovation grant applications outstanding.

Over 400 written responses were received following the issue of the consultation paper on the future of private housing renewal programmes on 21 June 1993. I announced short-term changes arising from that consultation on 3 November and I refer the hon. Member to the Official Report, column 206.

Liverpool Airport (Planning Application)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will call in the Liverpool airport planning application, consider it in tandem with the Manchester application, appoint the same inspector to consider both and base a decision on a coherent approach to the north-west region as a whole.

Mr. Baldry: I understand that the application was submitted to the relevant local planning authorities on 3 December. It is for those authorities in the first instance to undertake statutory and other consultations and reach a preliminary view on the proposals, before the question of intervention by the Secretary of State would be considered.

Environment Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what matters were discussed; what decisions were taken; and what was the voting record of each member state at the Environment Council in Brussels on 2 December.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 3 December 1993]: I attended the Environment Council meeting on 2 December in Brussels. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment attended on 3 December.

A common position was reached unanimously on a directive to set further reductions in passenger car emissions. It will apply to all cars sold in the EU as from 1 January 1997. The directive also commits the Commission to come forward, by the end of 1994, with proposals for further substantial reductions in emissions from the year 2000.

The Council agreed that the Community will ratify the Copenhagen amendment to the Montreal protocol. Member states will ratify, as far as possible, simultaneously and not later than 30 June 1994. Political agreement was reached on the proposed regulation on substances that deplete the ozone layer. The production and use of methyl bromide is to be frozen in 1995 at 1991 levels, with a 25 per cent. cut by 1998. The consumption of hydrochlorofluorocarbons is to be capped in 1995, with a cut of 35 per cent. in 2004. The level of the cap will be 2·6 per cent. of the chlorofluorocarbon consumption plus all HCFC consumption in 1989. The production and import of HCFC's will be controlled by quotas once 80 per cent. of the cap, or the year 2000, has been reached. Use controls of HCFC's will be introduced. There will be a duty to recover and to prevent leakages of controlled substances in certain circumstances.

A common position was reached on an amendment to the hazardous waste directive deferring implementation to spring 1995. The United Kingdom abstained because of concern over the definition of hazardous waste which would have had the effect of making all wastes contained on the list deemed hazardous in all circumstances.

The Council discussed progress reports on the amended proposals for directives on waste landfill and the disposal of polychlorinated biphenyls and PCTs. There was an open debate about the Commission Green Paper on remedying environmental damage. My right hon. Friend made clear the Government's concerns about over-restrictive liability regimes. Progress on the follow-up to the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development was briefly discussed.

In discussion of implementation and enforcement of Community environmental legislation, the Council agreed to work for the consistent and effective application of legislation in all member states. The Council will review the position in specific sectors at future meetings.

The amended proposals for a directive on packaging and packaging waste and the Community strategy for climate change were discussed at length; the Council will resume discussions on these on 13 December.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Budget

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications of the spending plans and the projections of economic growth and inflation announced on 30 November for the level of aid to developing countries.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The spending plans announced on 30 November reflect the Government's firm commitment to a substantial and effective aid programme. The aid budget, covering aid to developing countries and assistance to central and eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, is planned to rise by £83 million by 1996-97, compared with the 1993-94 provision. The Government do not forecast future aid/GNP ratios. The DAC ratios are calculated on calendar year expenditure.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much of the combined aid budget for the current financial year announced on 30 November will be devoted to assistance to (a) central and eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union and (b) developing countries, as defined by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The provision for 1993-94, announced last year, is £1,900 million for aid to developing countries and £232 million for assistance to central and eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. From 1994-95 there will be a combined aid budget. Details of expenditure by country and region will continue to be shown in the annual British aid statistics.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much of the combined aid budget announced on 30 November for each of the years 1994-95, 1995-96 and 1996-97 will be devoted to assistance to (a) central and eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union and (b) developing countries, as defined by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The combined aid budget will allow the Government to allocate aid more effectively in response to the needs of countries individually. The main focus of our aid programme will continue to be to reduce poverty and suffering in the poorest countries, particularly those in Africa and Asia, as well as to provide know-how assistance for countries in central and eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. The levels of our assistance are carefully reviewed each year in the light of the public expenditure survey outcome. Details of expenditure by country and region will continue to be shown in the annual British aid statistics.

Non-governmental Organisations

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria are used in allocating Government funds to non-governmental organisations working overseas.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: For humanitarian aid we require proposals addressing the assessed needs. The key objective in allocating Government funds in such circumstances is saving lives. The size and scope of the disaster, steps being taken by the local government or by the Red Cross or Red Crescent Society and action taken or proposed by United Nations organisations and other non-governmental organisations are also important factors affecting our decisions.

Funds for long-term development are allocated for activities which are judged to contribute to our aim of promoting sustainable economic and social development and improving the quality of life for poor people generally. Organisations must proviede evidence that they have the capacity to carry out the projects or programmes for which they have sought support. They must also demonstrate that they are able to account properly for the funds.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what methods are used to monitor the spending of non-governmental organisations working overseas that receive financial grants from Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: For disaster relief we receive both narrative and financial reports from non-governmental organisations on the spending of grants. The regularity of reporting depends on the period covered by the grant.

Organisations receiving funds for long-term development work submit regular financial and progress reports and a final report is submitted on completion of the work.

We also undertaken periodic evaluations, in co-operation with NGOs, of their development work and their systems for assessing its effectiveness.

United Nations High Commission for Refugees

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance he is giving to enable the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to respond to emergency situations in the current year.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development has approved an additional contribution to UNHCR of £1·35 million—equivalent to $2 million—to help replenish its emergency fund. This will enable UNHCR to continue to make initial responses to emergencies, in advance of putting together a longer-term assistance programme.

Britain's overall contributions to UNHCR activities this year now amounts to £50·75 million.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iraq

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the use of chemical weapons against the marsh Arabs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Reports of the use of chemical weapons in the southern marshes of Iraq last September caused us great concern. We immediately offered resources to the United Nations Special Commission to help it investigate the allegations and a British scientist took part in the UNSCOM 65 mission to the marshes in November. UNSCOM could find no immediate evidence that chemical weapons had been used at the sites visited. However, the mission took a large number of soil, water, fauna and flora samples which are now being analysed. Conclusive results will not be known for some months. We remain committed to supporting UNSCOM in its search and destruction of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction.

Hong Kong

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the People's Republic of China about the freedom of movement of Hong Kong residents who are holders of BN(O) passports after 1997; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The terms of memoranda exchanged by the United Kingdom and Chinese sides and associated with the Joint Declaration enable Hong Kong residents with British National (Overseas) Passports to use these passports as travel documents after 1997. Under the Joint Declaration and the Basic Law all Hong Kong residents, including BNO passport holders, will enjoy freedom of travel.

Common Foreign and Security Policy

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out in detail the procedures and new mechanisms for co-operation in the field of common foreign and security policy to which he referred in his speech in Bologna on 29 November; and if he will indicate under which specific provisions of the Maastricht treaty each of these procedures and mechanisms is established.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The provisions of title V—common foreign and security policy—of the treaty on European Union, which came into force on 1 November, introduce some new mechanisms to make intergovernmental co-operation among the member states on foreign policy more efficient. Chapter IV of the report on implementation of the treaty on European Union, which was agreed at the Brussels European Council on 29 October, sets out some of the practical details of implementation of the provisions of title V. The report is available in the Library of the House.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government support the proposals by the Belgian presidency of the EU seeking to implement a common code on the publicity given to documents provided to or initiated by the Council of Ministers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Foreign Affairs Council on 6 December agreed a code of conduct for the Council and the Commission to follow in responding to requests by members of the public for access to documents held by the Council or the Commission. We supported the presidency's proposals, which fulfilled a commitment entered into at Maastricht.

World Service

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current position of the new relay station for the World Service in Thailand; and when he expects it to be completed.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have reached agreement in principle with the Thai authorities for the construction of the new relay station. Detailed site survey work, which is required before final project approval can be given, is close to completion. The target date for completion of the project is 1996.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what will be the impact of the reduction in his Department's grant to the World Service of the BBC on the range of language services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The funding provision for the World Service from 1994-95 to 1996-97 will enable it to introduce two new language services, Uzbek and Azeri. There are no plans at present to discontinue any existing language service, but small reductions are likely in the hours of broadcast of a few services.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the BBC on the practical impact of reductions in his Department's grant to the World Service.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The planned funding levels for the 1994-95 to 1996-97 triennium, discussed in advance with the BBC, have been protected despite the toughest expenditure round for years. Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials and the World Service have already provisionally discussed resource allocation for the triennium on the basis of these planned figures. Now that the figures have been confirmed, we will agree with the World Service a more detailed plan for the triennium.

CSCE Meeting

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the meeting of the CSCE Ministers in Rome.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [pursuant to his reply 7 December 1993]: The fourth paragraph should read:

> "I regret that despite intensive negotiations the Council was unable to agree on any new steps to resolve the conflict dealt with by the Conference on Nagorno-Karabakh."

Unfortunately no agreement was reached at the Rome Council on Nagorno-Karabakh and the Minsk process.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Car Parks

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what steps he is taking or considering to ensure that the large car-parking providers offer a more secure environment for the parking of vehicles;

(2) what steps he is taking to stimulate awareness and activity among car-parking providers on security matters so as to bring their efforts up to those of vehicle manufacturers;

(3) what steps he is taking to ensure that local government car parking providers ensure a higher degree of security in their car parks;

(4) what consultations he is planning with major car parking companies to encourage greater security of car parking facilities;

(5) what consideration he has given to introducing a system by which car owners and drivers can evaluate the safety of available car parking facilities;

(6) what discussions he has had with his European counterparts on the way in which car parking providers can be made more responsible for vehicles parked in their premises for a fee;

(7) what steps he is considering to increase the degree of responsibility borne by car parking providers for the safety of vehicles in their care.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Last year, the Home Office published crime prevention unit paper No. 34, "Preventing Car Crime in Car Parks", a copy of which is in the Library. This was widely distributed.

My predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), met the major car parking operators, local authority associations, consumer bodies and others in January to discuss what could be done to improve car park security. I intend to have a further meeting early next year to review progress.

We urge all car park operators to support the national secured car park scheme, which was launched by the police in September 1992, with Home Office support. Under that scheme, operators can apply for an award if their premises meet prescribed security standards. This enables motorists to identify car parks with good security. Both local authorities and private operators are participating in the scheme. Awards have been made to more than 150 car parks and many more are pending.

There have been no specific discussions with our European counterparts on this matter.

Life Sentences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many inmates serving life sentences are at present being detained in any open prison establishment in England and Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Tom Cox, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the number of inmates serving life sentences being detained in any open Prison Service establishment.

On 31 October 1993, the latest date for which information is available, there were 274 life sentence prisoners detained in open Prison Service establishments in England and Wales.

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what extra money and staffing is now under consideration by his Department to meet the cost of his policy on prison population; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about resources for dealing with the projected prison population.

Following the recently announced Unified Budget decisions, the Prison Service will give priority to providing and staffing additional places. These include over 2000 new houseblock places in existing prisons by 1996-97, at a total cost of £120m, and approximately 3600 places in six new prisons. The first two of these are expected to be completed in 1997-98. It is intended that they should be privately financed and the costs will depend on the size, design, role, site and ground conditions.

Directly employed staff numbers are planned to increase by 1200 between 1993-94 and 1996-97, at an approximate cost of £30m. It will be for the private contractors to decide the staffing of the new prisons.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current year's budget for each London prison; how much will be spent in the current year in each London prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated December 1993:

Budgets of London Prisons

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the current year's budget for each London prison and how much will be spent in the current year.

The position is set out in the following table:

Establishment	Annual budget year 1993-94 £	Forecast outturn year 1993-94 £	Outturn as percentage of budget
Belmarsh	20,931,948	20,722,799	99·1
Brixton[1]	21,226,193	20,732,800	97·6
Holloway	15,194,894	14,917,646	98·1
Latchmere House	2,199,317	2,174,693	98·8
Pentonville	15,292,359	15,183,192	99·2
Wandsworth	21,022,124	20,859,075	99·2
Wormwood Scrubs	20,029,785	19,776,811	98·7

[1] Includes the addition of £376,000 for plated meals because the kitchen has been closed.

The figures suggest that there will be an underspend at each of the London prisons but the forecast totals are likely to increase as the prison population is rising during the second half of the financial year. Adjustments may be made to allocations in the year.

DNA Genetic Profiling

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will estimate the number of individuals who will provide a non-intimate sample for DNA genetic profiling purposes by the year 2000, 2010 and 2020 under his proposals; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The numbers will depend upon the extent to which police forces make use of the powers that the Government propose to give to them.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what period he intends that DNA genetic profiles will be retained; and whether the length of time will be affected by the nature of the offence.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Government do not propose to set any statutory limit on the period during which the DNA records of those convicted of recordable offences can be retained.

Prisons (Hospital Beds)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of hospital beds at each of the London prisons on 15 November; and what was the number of prison inmates being held in each of the prison hospital wings.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated December 1993:

I have been asked to reply to your recent Question about prison hospital beds at each of the London prisons on 15 November.

I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his earlier Question on 2 December 1993 (column 671).

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how costs are borne in respect of inmates treated at the hospital of a prison other than the one on whose roll they are counted.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about costs in respect of inmates treated at the hospital of a prison other than the one on whose roll they are counted.

When a prisoner is transferred to another prison for medical reasons, the accommodation, treatment and related costs are customarily borne by the receiving prison. The transport costs are borne by the sending prison.

Baroness Thatcher

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of police security provided for Baroness Thatcher to sign copies of her memoirs at bookshops.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not held centrally.

Car Boot Sales

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police forces regularly patrol car boot sales where the sale of stolen goods is suspected.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Decisions about the deployment of officers are operational matters for chief officers.

Computer Pornography

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the most frequent means of distribution of computer pornography to children.

Mr. Maclean: I am aware of reports of cases where computer disks containing pornography have exchanged hands in school playgrounds, although it is impossible to estimate reliably how many children may have been exposed to computer pornography in this way. In such cases the police are able to act under the Obscene Publications Acts 1959 and 1964. There is also evidence of pornographic material being transmitted along public telephone lines from computer bulletin boards. Such activity is an offence under the Telecommunications Act 1984.

Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements he has made for the current year's review of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989; and how observations from interested persons or organisations should be submitted for consideration.

Mr. Howard: I am glad to say that Mr. J. J. Rowe QC, this year's chairman of the Bar Council, has accepted my invitation to succeed Viscount Colville of Culross QC in carrying out this annual review. Viscount Colville has performed this task with great dedication and integrity and has deservedly won widespread respect. I am extremely grateful to him for this invaluable public service.

Written observations about the operation of the Act should be submitted to Mr. Rowe, c/o Room 647, Home Office, 50 Queen Anne's Gate, London SW1H 9AT by 15 January 1994.

Prison Deaths

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the death of Nauwit Zinzuwadia at Her Majesty's prison Welford road, Leicester;

(2) how many deaths there have been in each year and in which prisons in each of the last 15 years; what percentage of those deaths have been suicides; and what other categories of death have been registered;

(3) what steps he is taking to reduce the number of deaths in prison.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Keith Vaz, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your three recent Parliamentary Questions about deaths in custody.

Death of Nauwit Zinzuwadia at Leicester Prison

You asked for a statement about the death of Mr. Zinzuwadia in Leicester prison on 16 June this year. I will endeavour to explain the sequence of events, but may I say at the outset how very saddened we in the Prison Service are by this tragedy.

Mr. Zinzuwadia was received into Leicester prison from Leicester Magistrates' Court on 24 July 1991 charged with burglary, threats to kill, affray, and having an imitation firearm with intent.

Upon reception, Mr. Zinzuwadia did not display any suicidal tendencies although he did report a history of alcoholism, and treatment for depression at Leicester General Hospital.

Mr. Zinzuwadia was granted bail on 11 September 1991. On 7 January 1992 he was committed for trial to Leicester Crown Court, and on 5 October 1992 he was convicted of affray and possessing an imitation firearm with intent, and was remanded for pre-sentence reports.

On 30 October 1992 he was sentenced to 30 months' imprisonment, and on 10 November 1992 he was transferred to Ashwell Prison.

At Ashwell Mr. Zinzuwadia was treated for various minor physical complaints, but did not show any psychiatric symptoms until 18 May 1993, when he was diagnosed as depressed and paranoid but not suicidal. Anti-depressive medication was prescribed and Mr. Zinzuwadia was to be seen again the following day.

It appears from the medical records that Mr. Zinzuwadia expressed dislike of the open regime at Ashwell. On 19 May consideration was given to transferring Mr. Zinzuwadia to Leicester after his condition was reviewed and continued to cause concern. Initially, Dr. de Silva at Leicester was not prepared to accept Mr. Zinzuwadia due to pressure on accommodation in the small health care centre at that prison. After discussions with the Duty Principal Medical Officer, however, the transfer was agreed. On arrival at Leicester Mr. Zinzuwadia was located in the ward and he was seen by Dr. de Silva on 20 May. Mr. Zinzuwadia indicated that he was being "got at" by other inmates at Ashwell and felt unable to cope with prison. He displayed no suicidal

Mr. Zinzuwadia settled well at Leicester and associated normally with other prisoners. On 24 May his medical condition was reviewed. He was assessed by Dr. de Silva as stable, level in mood and displaying no evidence of serious mental disorder or suicidal ideation, and was returned to Ashwell. His symptoms are ascribed to cannabis abuse, and he was warned about this.

On 15 June Mr. Zinzuwadia became disturbed, assaulted a member of staff and had to be restrained using Control and Restraint techniques. He appeared to have become paranoid about staff. Dr. Moore, the medical officer at Ashwell, was concerned about Mr. Zinzuwaida's disturbed mental state and contacted Dr. de Silva to see whether Mr. Zinzuwadia could be returned to Leicester. She considered he needed further psychiatric assessment at the parent health care facility at Leicester. It was agreed that Mr. Zinzuwadia was suitable for transfer. On arrival back at Leicester Mr. Zinzuwadia was placed in single furnished accommodation in the health care centre under normal observation.

At 8.30 hours on 16 June Mr. Zinzuwadia made a phone call to his wife, and was permitted to make further calls on the official line as his phonecard had been used up. A Health Care Officer noted that the phone conversation seemed normal.

Later that morning Dr. de Silva interviewed Mr. Zinzuwadia and concluded that he was displaying symptoms of an acute paranoid psychosis. He prescribed 100mgs of Largactil to be taken three times a day. No suicidal tendencies or fears of injury from anyone else were identified. Mr. Zinzuwadia was located in single accommodation as a precaution, as he had recently been displaying paranoid tendencies and had assaulted staff only 24 hours previously.

Later on 16 June Mr. Zinzuwadia requested a family visit for the following day, and this request was agreed by Dr. de Silva, who noted that he did not seem in a depressed mood at this time. Dr. de Silva saw him again on the landing of the health care centre at around 15.30 and noted no signs of distress.

At 18.30 on 16 June both a Health Care Officer and an inmate cleaner spoke to Mr. Zinzuwadia after the evening meal and he gave no obvious indications of any distress, although the Health Care Officer formed the view that Mr. Zinzuwadia "didn't seem talkative".

At 19.10 on 16 June the same Health Care Officer looked in to Mr. Zinzuwadia's cell and saw that he was standing against the window bars, opposite the cell door. He was looking towards the floor, and his arms were hanging down by his side. The Health Care Officer spoke to Mr. Zinzuwadia, who did not reply, so he entered the cell and established that Mr. Zinzuwadia was hanging from the window bars by a ligature made of white cord. He supported Mr. Zinzuwadia by using his own body to wedge Mr. Zinzuwadia's body against the window bars while he unhooked the ligature from around the neck. He carried Mr. Zinzuwadia to the bed, shouted for help, and began resuscitation. No pulse was detected.

An inmate responded to the shouts, ran to the cell and at the Health Care Officer's request ran to the office to summon help. The inmate also collected a resuscitation box from the treatment room.

Another officer then arrived with Dr. Chahal, and resuscitation was continued. An external ambulance crew also arrived and attempted to monitor Mr. Zinzuwadia's respiration. After discussion between Dr. Chahal and the ambulance crew, resuscitation was discontinued, and Mr. Zinzuwadia was pronounced dead at 19.30 hours.

At the inquest, the jury concluded that he died from suicide whilst the balance of his mind was disturbed. There was no finding of any lack of care on the part of the Prison Service.

Deaths in custody 1978-1993

You asked for a breakdown of deaths in custody by Prison Service establishment since 1978, distinguishing suicides from other deaths. The information is set out in the attached tables. Information about suicides includes all apparent self-inflicted deaths.

Measures to reduce deaths in prisons

There are generally around 70-80 deaths in Prison Service custody each year. A little over half of these (41 in 1992) are self-inflicted. Most of the remainder are by natural causes. I shall assume that our interest lies principally in self-inflicted deaths.

Suicide is a very complex problem, to which there is no simple or single solution. There are many vulnerable people in prison, and we cannot remove all the causes of distress which lead to emotional crisis. Identifying prisoners at risk is an imprecise science, and much depends on the willingness of prisoners to confide their feelings in staff or volunteer befrienders. It is also extremely difficult, without resort to oppressive measures, to prevent a prisoner who is absolutely determined to kill himself from doing so.

The Prison Service is, however, committed to the care of prisoners and we are taking a wide range of measures to enhance the quality of care. Our strategy involves both "primary care" to create an environment which helps prisoners to cope with problems, combined with "special care" to identify and support prisoners in times of crisis. The strategy aims to minimise the risk of suicide though it cannot eliminate it.

The key elements of primary care are good relationships between staff and prisoners, active regimes, decent physical conditions and maintaining a safe and ordered environment. This includes action to reduce bullying: one of the main causes of suicidal crisis, particularly among young prisoners. We issued an anti-bullying guide to establishments in June.

Personal officer schemes have now been introduced into the vast majority of establishments. The relationship between the personal officer and the prisoner is the crucial first line of help with the prisoner's problems.

Our approach to the provision of special care is multi-disciplinary. Suicide is far from being simply a medical problem and we aim to involve the whole prison community. All establishments have Suicide Awareness Teams which meet regularly to review local policy, monitor incidents and develop new ideas. They also maintain staff and prisoner awareness and identify training needs. We have a dedicated Suicide Awareness Support Unit in Prison Service Headquarters to develop national policy and spread good practice.

Branches of the Samaritans are represented on local Suicide Awareness Teams and at most establishments visit prisoners regularly. Some also have special phone links. Samaritan services to prisoners are co-ordinated by a national liaison officer.

"Listener" Schemes, in which selected prisoners are trained by the Samaritans to befriend other prisoners in distress, are now established in 40 prisons and planned in many others. You may be aware that Leicester prison is currently introducing a Listener scheme.

Staff training in suicide awareness has been reviewed in the light of new research, and a new package recently issued to establishments, together with a video ("Misadventures") which was produced in collaboration with the Samaritans.

We have also carried out a thorough review of our procedures and documentation for managing prisoners identified as at risk. This review has taken as its starting-point Judge Tumim's conclusion in his report of 1990 that the existing procedures relied too heavily on medical assessment and treatment. New procedures, which will be introduced by 1 April 1994, aim to improve communication and teamwork, and particularly to make greater use of the skills of prison officers in identifying, counselling and supervising those at risk.

A new screening form will also be introduced, aimed at improving the way prisoners' health care needs—both physical and mental health—are identified on reception. Assessment of suicide risk will continue to be part of the new reception procedure.

The provision of specialist health care services remains an important aspect of the strategy, particularly where suicide risk is related to treatable psychiatric problems. The Director of Health Care is carrying out a comprehensive programme of development aimed at ensuring that prisoners have access to the same standards of health care in prison as people in the community. Where prisoners are suffering from mental disorders under the Mental Health Act 1983 the policy of the Government is that they should be cared for within the NHS rather than the penal system.

The Prison Service, the Criminal Department of the Home Office and the Department of Health are together taking a range of measures aimed at diverting mentally disordered people from prison, improving the psychiatric assessment of prisoners and facilitating transfers to hospital under the 1983 Act in appropriate cases.

As the tables accompanying this letter are too lengthy to be produced in Hansard, copies have been placed in the House of Commons Library.

SCOTLAND

Common Fisheries Policy

13. Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last attended a meeting of the Fisheries Council to discuss developments in the common fisheries policy as they affect the Scottish fleet; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: I attend Fisheries Councils regularly, the most recent being the Luxembourg Council in October, and will do so again on December 20.

Hospital Waiting Lists

14. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the health service in Scotland to discuss hospital waiting lists.

Mr. Stewart: My noble and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health last discussed hospital waiting lists with health board chairmen on 25 June. Departmental officials last discussed the matter with health board general managers on 27 October.

Sport and Recreation

16. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for the development of sport and recreation in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: The Government's policies for sport and recreation in Scotland are implemented principally through the Scottish Sports Council, which receives annual grant-in-aid from my right hon. Friend. The council's objectives are to increase participation and improve performance in sport and recreation at all levels.

Education (Administration)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in respect of each local education authority area in Scotland in each year since 1986 the number of people who are (a) wholly engaged in administration, (b) engaged in administration and teaching and (c) wholly engaged in teaching.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The table details the full-time equivalent number of lecturers and teachers employed in Scottish local education authority areas as at March in the respective years. No information is held centrally on the number of lecturers, teachers and other staff who, either wholly or partly, carry out an administrative role. The information is taken from the joint staffing watch, a survey run jointly by the Scottish Office and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. Specific information on the numbers of school teachers can be found in the statistical bulletin "Pupils and Teachers in Education Authority Primary and Secondary Schools".

Health Care (Glasgow)

17. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will meet the chairman of the Greater Glasgow health board to discuss health issues in the Glasgow area.

Mr. Lang: I refer the Gentleman to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway).

22. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to meet the chairman and the board of Greater Glasgow health board to discuss health matters in Glasgow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I would be happy to meet the chairman of Greater Glasgow health board on a mutually convenient date to discuss health matters in Glasgow.

Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh

18. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the starting date of the proposed new Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh.

Mr. Stewart: Lothian health board's acute services strategy, which includes proposals for a new Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, is currently out to public consultation. My right hon. Friend looks forward to considering the proposals in detail once public consultation is complete and the board has submitted its final plans to him for approval.

Jetstream Factory, Prestwick

19. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with other Departments concerning the future of the Jetstream factory at Prestwick; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: The Scottish Office has been in close touch with colleagues in other Departments, in particular the Department of Trade and Industry, about Jetstream Aircraft. The Government's commitment to the future development of the Prestwick manufacturing factory is evidenced by a substantial offer of regional selective assistance—one of the largest offers ever made in Scotland.

Structural Plans

20. Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy on accepting or amending draft structural plans from regional councils.

Mr. Lang: Policy guidance on structure plans is set out in SDD circular 32/1983 and planning advice note 37, a copy of which is available in the Library.

European Regional Development Fund

21. Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total value of grants that Scotland has received from the European regional development fund since its inception.

Mr. Stewart: Since the inception of the European regional development fund in 1975, Scotland has benefited from awards totalling almost £1·2 billion.

Scottish Enterprise

23. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the budget of Scottish Enterprise.

Mr. Stewart: Scottish Enterprise's budget for 1993-94 stands at £451·3 million. My right hon. Friend shall be announcing shortly Scottish Enterprise's budget for 1994-95 in his statement on public expenditure in Scotland.

Drugs-related Deaths (Glasgow)

24. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will establish a full public inquiry into drugs-related deaths in Glasgow.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. A conjoined fatal accident inquiry was held into four of these deaths on 1 and 2 November. To enable consideration to be given to the wider policy issues, the Crown Office has made available to the Scottish Office information collected by the procurator fiscal about these four and other similar deaths during the past two years. This information is being studied by the drugs task force under the chairmanship of my noble and learned Friend the Minister of State which is currently reviewing policies to tackle drug misuse in Scotland.

Salmon

25. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further measures he proposes to take to assist the Scottish salmon farming industry.

Sir Hector Monro: The minimum import price for Atlantic salmon introduced by the European Commission with effect from 20 November provides a temporary floor to the EC market. I hope that the industry will respond quickly to the Commission's invitation to update the information it submitted in 1991 in support of allegations of dumping on to the EC market by Norwegian exporters, so as to allow a further investigation to proceed. In addition, Scottish Office officials have met the Commission Services about the introduction from 1 January 1994 of a reference price for salmon to provide a basis for any future safeguard action, as well as discussing with the industry the possible establishment of producer organisations and other measures to reduce cyclical fluctuations and market imbalance for salmon.

34. Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of rod-caught Salmon on Scottish east coast rivers in the last recorded year and five years ago.

Sir Hector Monro: My Department's catch statistics show that 64,124 salmon and grisle were caught by rod and line on Scottish east coast rivers in 1992 as compared with 69,439 in 1988.

Set-aside

26. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about the European Union set-aside rules and payments for Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: Since the introduction of the arable area payments scheme my right hon. Friend and I have received representations about the set-aside rules and about payments from a number of organisations and individuals.

32. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the arable set-aside scheme.

Sir Hector Monro: The main purpose of the set-aside element of the arable area payments scheme is to reduce arable production in all member states. It therefore has an important role to play in meeting the objectives of reform of the common agricultural policy.

River Clyde (Dredging)

27. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when his officials last met representatives of Clydeport Ltd. to discuss the dredging of the River Clyde.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scottish Office officials meet Clydeport Ltd. from time to time. Such contacts cover a range of topics.

Local Government (Monklands)

28. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last discussed the standard and quality of local government in the Monklands area of Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: My colleagues and I continue to take a close interest in the provision of local government in the Monklands area, as elsewhere in Scotland.

Howie Report

29. Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made with regard to the consideration of the Howie report in view of the representations which have been received.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am still considering the Howie committee's proposals for the reform of upper secondary school awards in Scotland in the light of the representations which have been received. Decisions will be announced as soon as possible.

House Building

30. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many public sector houses were built in Scotland last year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is contained in table 5 of the Scottish Office Statistical Bulletin (Housing Series) No. HSG/1993/8—"Housing Trends in Scotland"—which is available in the House Library.

Industrial Waste

31. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for making safe sites contaminated by industrial waste; and what will be the cost to the Exchequer.

Sir Hector Monro: Responsibility for dealing with contaminated sites rests with the site owners. Any Government contribution towards the cost of decontamination is likely to come mainly through the Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise networks, which have between them £95 million to devote to environmental activity, including decontamination work. The level of priority and resources to be allocated to such work is a matter for the local enterprise companies to decide.

As far as local authorities are concerned, the capital allocation to their general services budget is not targeted and it is for each council to determine its own priorities for expenditure on any such work.

Homelessness

33. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further steps he is taking to tackle homelessness in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Housing authorities have the statutory responsibility for dealing with homelessness. On 1 December I announced £4·35 million extra resources for expenditure on 36 homelessness projects by housing authorities in 1993-94.

This is in addition to the £513 million allocated to housing authorities in March for investment in public and private housing in 1993-94. Homelessness is one of the three priorities which housing authorities have been asked to address in their housing strategies and output targets.

Agriculture

35. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the National Farmers Union to discuss current financial problems in Scottish agriculture.

Sir Hector Monro: I have regular meetings with the National Farmers Union of Scotland at which we discuss current issues and prospects for the farming industry. The last such meeting took place on 13 October. My right hon. Friend last met the SNFU on 24 November.

Fatal Accident Inquiries (Payment)

36. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now review the regulations and rules governing eligibility for payment from public funds to those represented at fatal accident inquiries.

Mr. Lang: I have no plans to do so.

Irvine Development Corporation

37. Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further consideration he has given to the wind-up programme for Irvine development corporation.

Mr. Stewart: The consultation exercise on the making of wind-up orders for Irvine, Cumbernauld and Livingston development corporations has now been completed. After giving careful consideration to the responses received, I have now made wind-up orders for all three corporations. These orders will come into effect on 1 January 1994 and will provide for the wind-up of the corporations to commence on 1 January 1994 and be completed by 31 December 1996. They also include provision for the revocation of the corporations' special development orders on 31 March 1996 with protection to preserve the effect of any certificate of authorised development for a further period of five years.

Firth of Forth (Road Bridge)

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what public consultation he proposes to hold on whether a second road bridge should be built across the Firth of Forth at Queensferry; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The proposal for a new bridge across the Firth of Forth is part of a package of proposals which includes improvements to road, bus and rail services in the cross-Forth and west of Edinburgh areas.

Other proposals were identified in the Government's paper "Setting Forth" which was the subject of wide-ranging public consultation in 1992. A scheme to build a new bridge would be subject to the usual statutory procedures, which would include formal consultation before a possible public inquiry.

Forestry Commission Land

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in respect of which areas of Forestry Commission land assurances have been issued that they will not be privatised; and according to what criteria these decisions are made.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Ministers will await the advice of the Forestry Review Group before considering what action, if any, should be taken in respect of the ownership and management of Forestry Commission woodlands.

Mr. Laurence Peterken

Mr. George Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what conditions were attached to the appointment of Mr. Laurence Peterken to the NHS executive.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 2 December 1993]: A condition of Mr. Laurence Peterken's appointment as special projects director was that he agreed not to pursue any action against Greater Glasgow health board.

DEFENCE

Eurofighter 2000

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what stage of development has been reached in the Eurofighter 2000 project; and if he will make a statement with particular reference to the partnership between the Government and the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Aitken: I met my German opposite number, State Secretary Schönbohm, in Munich last month. We reviewed the progress of the EF 2000 development programme with the senior management of the German and United Kingdom partner companies in the Eurofighter consortium, and were assured that first flight would occur in April 1994 and that there are no major technical problems affecting this or other aspects of the development programme. We agreed on the importance of the project to both countries.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Aitken: The code of practice for information security management has been developed by, and established for use by, commercial organisations; it does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information. The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government Departments have been developed specifically for use within Government, and are reviewed regularly to ensure best practice.

Defence Radiological Protection Service

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the unclassified reports produced by the Defence Radiological Protection Service since January 1992; and if he will place copies of each unclassified report in the Library.

Mr. Hanley: The list of reports is given:

Marine Environmental Radioactivity Surveys at Nuclear Submarine Berths in United Kingdom—1992	[1]—

[1] To be published by HMSO at end of 1993.

I will arrange for copies to be placed in the Library.

Radioactivity Surveys

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statment on the findings of (a) the marine environmental radioactivity survey of Gibraltar, DRPS report 12/92, (b) the marine environmental radioactivity survey of Hong Kong, DRPS report 3/92, (c) the marine environmental radioactivity survey of Bermuda, DRPS report 10/92 and (d) the marine environmental radioactivity survey of Diego Garcia DRPS report 11/92.

Mr. Hanley: The reports referred to are part of a routine programme of environmental radioactivity surveys which is carried out by the Defence Radiological Protection Service around all berths in the United Kingdom and dependent territories that are used by nuclear powered warships. In each case, the findings demonstrate that there has been no radiological hazard to any member of the public as a result of nuclear powered warship operation.

Sea Harrier Squadrons

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for Royal Navy Sea Harrier squadrons to request participation in flag exercises in north America.

Mr. Hanley: There are no plans to request participation by Royal Navy Sea Harriers in flag exercises in north America.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for Royal Navy Sea Harrier squadrons to conduct training at Canadian forces base Goose Bay.

Mr. Hanley: There are plans for Royal Navy Sea Harriers to conduct training at Goose Bay.

RAF Aircraft (Goose Bay)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many weapons, and of what types, were dropped by Royal Air Force aircraft during training from Canadian forces base Goose bay in each year since 1989.

Mr. Hanley: Numbers of practice weapons dropped in the southern low-level training area weapons range are as follows:

	1992	1993
Inert 1,000 lb bombs	285	100
Inert 28 lb practice bombs	315	180

There is no regulatory requirement to hold records of weapons expended for more than one year; details of weapons dropped in the years before 1992 are therefore not available.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the requirements of (a) Royal Air Force Tornado GR1 units and (b) Royal Air Force Tornado F3 units for use of medium level airspace for training at Canadian forces base Goose bay.

Mr. Hanley: The RAF's principal requirement for training at Goose bay is to enable Tornado GR1s to practice operational low flying and to conduct day/night, all-weather, terrain-following radar operations. There is, therefore, no requirement for Tornado GR1s to operate in medium-level airspace other than on the rare occasions when aircraft require an air test. Tornado F3s deployed to Goose bay would not plan to operate regularly at medium level, although they may do so from time to time in support of the low-level training sorties of other aircraft.

Military Aircraft (Practice Interceptions)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what are the minimum horizontal ranges to which a military aircraft carrying out a practice interception on a non-co-operating civil aircraft is permitted to approach its target;

(2) if he will make a statement on the changes made to procedures for practice interceptions of civil airliners, following the aircraft proximity hazard incident off Fife on 22 October 1992;

(3) what instructions are contained in the group air staff orders of No. 11 Group Royal Air Force, concerning the procedures to be followed by RAF aircraft conducting practice interceptions of non-co-operating civil aircraft.

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) on 29 November 1993, Official Report, column 369.

Armed Forces (Commitment)

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made on the ability of the armed forces, on the completion of "Options for Change", to meet all the commitments in NATO, Northern Ireland, Bosnia, Falklands, Cyprus and emergency duties; what areas will have priority; and which areas will have to be reassessed.

Mr. Hanley: The Government's plans for force restructuring are set out in "Defending Our Future", the 1993 Statement on the Defence Estimates. They are kept under constant review to ensure that Britain's armed forces remain well placed to meet our commitments at home and overseas. We have demonstrated our readiness to make adjustments to our plans to ensure that this remains the case.

Fife (Aircraft Proximity Hazard Incidents)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what access the joint airmiss working group had to the recordings of radio communication between the RAF Buchan air defence radar unit and the RAF Tornado involved in an aircraft proximity hazard incident with an Air UK BAe 146 aircraft off Fife on 22 October 1992, for the purposes of their investigation into that incident.

Mr. Hanley: The joint airmiss working group did not investigate this incident, which was reported under the parallel aircraft proximity hazard—APHAZ—scheme. APHAZ reports are investigated initially by the Civil Aviation Authority and analysed by an independent body of aviation, civil and military specialists known as the joint APHAZ assessment panel—JAAP. In this case, the JAAP had no access to the radio recordings or transcripts from RAF Buchan since these were classified. The JAAP did, however, receive reports from RAF Buchan and RAF Leuchars, the home base of the Tornado aircraft involved in the incident.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Hanley: MOD records are reviewed for continuing sensitivity in accordance with the guidelines set out in the open government White Paper—Cm 2290.

There are 27 mostly part-time reviewers—equivalent to 15 full time—five of which—three full time—are employed on sensitivity review. Records reviewed are accounted for in linear footage. In the 12 months to 31 October 1993, some 340 linear feet of records were examined by the sensitivity reviewers.

Nitro-cellulose and Nitro-glycerine

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there is a strategic requirement for the United Kingdom to retain the capability to produce nitro-cellulose and nitro-glycerine for small arms ammunition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: We do not regard the maintenance of this capability in the United Kingdom as a strategic necessity. As with all elements of the defence industrial base, however, we monitor developments in the industry carefully.

Bosnia

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many vehicles are currently in use by British forces in Bosnia; how many offer full armoured protection to the occupants; and how many are soft skinned.

Mr. Hanley: There are currently 917 vehicles of all types deployed in the United Kingdom within the former Yugoslavia. Of that number 190, including 65 Warriors, are armoured, giving all-round protection. The remaining 727 vehicles consist of trucks, bulk fuel vehicles, Land Rovers, engineers' plant and mechanical handling equipment. Not all of those vehicles will be in use at any one time.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what requests he has received to provide assistance in the investigation of alleged war crimes in Bosnia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: None, although British forces in Bosnia have facilitated investigation by providing armed escorts and armoured transport to United Nations investigators of alleged war crimes. They gave similar assistance to Dame Anne Warburton during her investigation earlier this year into the treatment of Muslim women in the former Yugoslavia.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy regarding the provision of assistance by British forces in the investigation of allegations of war crimes in Bosnia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: British forces in Bosnia provide assistance where possible to the United Nations or other official investigators of alleged war crimes on request.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which units have been identified to replace United Kingdom forces currently serving in Bosnia when their tours of duty expire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: No decisions have been taken about a further roulement of British forces in Bosnia in April-May next year. As a matter of sensible contingency planning, however, the 2nd Battalion, Royal Anglian Regiment has been identified and warned off as a possible replacement for 1st Battalion, Coldstream Guards, if a further six months deployment were to be undertaken.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information on alleged war crimes committed in Bosnia has been gathered by British forces deployed in the area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Any information British forces come across during the course of their duties is passed to the relevant United Nations authorities for investigation.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what policy developments have occurred in relation to the provision of assistance by British forces in the investigation of allegations of war crimes in bosnia in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: None.

Defence Support Agencies

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the criteria that he uses to assess the quality of work carried out by defence support agencies.

Mr. Hanley: The quality of the service delivered by defence agencies is measured in a number of ways which are tailored to the particular circumstances of each agency. Typically, these include key performance targets and agency reports and accounts, all of which are published annually, and the close involvement of the end user either through customer satisfaction surveys or formal boards, where representatives can ensure that their requirements are met and highlight any concerns. In some cases, defence agencies have achieved accreditation to BS5750 or have adopted a total quality approach to their activities—both giving my Department additional measures or quality or performance.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide a list of all the performance targets that have been established for defence support agencies.

Mr. Hanley: This is a matter of public record.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what defence support agencies he intends to establish in the next 12 months.

Mr. Hanley: Areas under review for defence agency status in the next 12 months are the Ministry of Defence police; RAF Training Group; the Fleet Maintenance and Repair Organisation; the Naval Marine Services Organisation; Army Logistic Information Systems; Army Engineer Services; RAF Signals; test and evaluation; Sales (Disposals); Service Children's Schools abroad but outside the Service Children's Schools (North West Europe) defence agency.

This process will involve, inter alia, consideration of operational implications and of prior options, including privatisation and contracting out. Final decisions will be taken case-by-case if it is clear that the best solution is to retain the activity within the Ministry of Defence.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the weighted number of allied quality assurance publication non-conformances by the Naval Aircraft Repair Organisation defence support agency in 1992-93; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: This matter falls within the responsibilities of the chief executive of the Naval Aircraft Repair Organisation defence agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Captain D. Symonds, Royal Navy, to Dr. David Clark dated 7 December 1993:

In response to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence concerning the weighted number of allied Quality Assurance publication Non-conformances by the Naval Aircraft Repair Organisation Defence Agency (NARO DA) in 1992-93:

The weighted number of allied Quality Assurance publication non-conformance by the NARO DA in 1992-93 was:

	Number
Fleetlands	548
Almondbank	124
NARO Total	672

The ratio of weighted non-conformances per audit showed a 19·6 per cent. improvement over the year in 1992-93.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what policy developments have occurred in respect of defence support agencies in the last two years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: In 1992 the Department conducted an internal review of next steps in the Ministry of Defence. Four main conclusions were reached: that greater attention needed to be paid to the Department's ownership role vis-a-vis its agencies; that programmes of training and education needed to be developed; that reviews for agency status should place much greater emphasis on strategic and management planning; and that resources should be provided for the development of agency accounting and management information systems.

Action has been taken or is in train under each of these headings. In addition, it was decided that the distinction formerly drawn between executive agencies in defence and defence support agencies had become counterproductive as it meant that agencies were viewed as falling into one or the other and as defence support agencies report to the Secretary of State through military or management channels of command rather than directly, this led to the retention of unnecessary central control. Accordingly, all next steps agencies in defence are known as defence agencies.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide details of all of the penalties that he has imposed on defence support agencies for non-performance in each of the last two years.

Mr. Hanley: Each year all the defence agencies are set clear and challenging key targets. They are required to demonstrate their performance against targets in their annual report. In the assessment of performance and setting of revised targets a judgment is made by agency owners as to whether the targets set for the previous year have been too demanding or not challenging enough. The question of imposing penalties has not arisen.

Devonport and Rosyth

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when he intends to take decisions about ownership restrictions relating to the sale of Devonport and Rosyth dockyards;

(2) if he will publish full details of ownership restrictions relating to the sale of Devonport and Rosyth dockyards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: I have nothing to add to my answer of 2 November to the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), Official Report, column 132, and my right hon. and learned Friend's comments to the House on 18 October, Official Report, column 41.

Ammunition and Propellant

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which foreign companies currently supply the armed services with ammunition and propellant.

Mr. Aitken: My Department does not procure propellant separately. Overseas companies who currently supply the Ministry of Defence with ammunition are:

GIAT, France;
Hirtenberger, Austria;
Muiden Chemie, The Netherlands;
Simmel, Italy;
Borletti, Italy;
De Kruithoorn, The Netherlands;
Nico, Germany; and La Crox, France.

Married Quarters

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Ministry of Defence married quarters were empty on (a) 30 September 1993, (b) 30 September 1992, (c) 30 September 1991, (d) 30 September 1990 and (e) 30 September 1989.

Mr. Hanley: The number of vacant Ministry of Defence married quarters on the dates requested was as follows:

	Vacant Service MQs	Surplus MQs in the process of sale
30 September 1993	10,124	1,106
30 September 1992	9,167	1,560
30 September 1991	9,834	1,461
30 September 1990	10,934	1,711
31 July 1989[1]	13,505	1,798

[1] Figures in 1989 were collected over a different reporting period.

The majority of vacant quarters at any one time are either undergoing or awaiting major maintenance work or modernisation, held for future developments or already allotted to service families who are due to move in shortly.

Operation Deny Flight

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the cost of British participation in Operation Deny Flight.

Mr. Hanley: The additional cost to the Defence budget for this financial year is currently estimated to be about £30 million.

NAAFI

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, column 686, what (a) management and (b) disciplinary action was taken as a result of the letter to Aims of Industry sent by James Rucker of 14 March 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: None. Mr. Rucker's letter indicated correctly that NAAFI is a non-political organisation and could have no relationship with Aims of Industry.

Mine Clearance

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people were trained by the British Army mine clearance training team during its participation in the recent United Nations operation in Cambodia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The United Kingdom's mine clearance training team trained a total of 42 Cambodians. The United Nations assigned the team to an area dominated by the Khmer Rouge, which withdrew its co-operation with the United Nations operation at an early stage and refused to permit further training. By the time the United Kingdom team had been relocated, this first training stage of the United Nations mine clearance operation was largely complete. The United Kingdom team was, however, able to participate fully in the subsequent United Nations supervision of mine clearance work by Cambodian teams which cleared over 45,000 mines and pieces of unexploded ordnance.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of deploying the British Army mine clearance training team as part of the recent United Nations operation in Cambodia.

Mr. Hanley: It is not possible to identify costs for specific elements of the British contingent deployed to Cambodia. The final cost of the United Kingdom deployment is not yet available, but to the end of September, some £2·5 million has been reported for the current financial year.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the source of financing for the deployment of the British Army mine clearance training team as part of the recent United Nations operation in Cambodia.

Mr. Hanley: The cost of British military involvement in the United Nations peacekeeping operation in Cambodia is in accordance with established interdepartmental arrangements whereby the Foreign and Commonwealth Office meet the extra costs of any deployment for the first 12 months and the full costs thereafter. The United Nations has overall financial responsibility and reimburses admissible national costs.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to the future deployment of mine clearance training teams; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The Government remain ready to consider requests for help with mine clearance training, as with all other forms of assistance in peace support operations.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with United Nations officials about the level of international demand for mine clearance training teams; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: None, but the United Nations has appointed a demining expert with whom the military adviser to the United Kingdom mission to the United Nations has had general discussions, as have officials from my Department and their counterparts at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Morale

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of changes in general service morale over the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: There is no evidence of any significant change in service morale over the past three years. This has been a period of considerable uncertainty for service personnel, but they continue to carry out their duties in a thoroughly professional manner. We aim to relieve uncertainty by making early announcements, whenever possible, of decisions concerning their future.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the current state of morale amongst the chiefs of staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The chiefs of staff accept the need for changes in the size and shape of our armed forces, and the reasons behind those changes. They recognise the considerable challenges posed by the changes and have a number of understandable concerns about the magnitude of the task and the uncertainties for their services. They are nevertheless fully committed to the Government's objective of preserving front-line capability through improvements to the cost-effectiveness and efficiency of its support.

Officers and Other Routes

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the change in the ratio between officer and other ranks between 1980 and 1992; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what was the ratio of officers to other ranks in each of the three armed services in 1970 and 1979.

Mr. Hanley: The ratios of officers to other ranks on the dates specified are as follows:

Date	RN	Army	RAF	All
1 April 1970	1: 6·60	1: 7·79	1: 4·55	1: 6·25
1 April 1979	1: 6·23	1: 8·11	1: 4·92	1: 6·54
1 April 1980	1: 6·10	1: 8·33	1: 5·06	1: 6·64
1 April 1992	1: 5·15	1: 7·43	1: 4·71	1: 5·92

These figures exclude locally enlisted personnel.

The ratios are based on strengths and reflect the requirement for officers and other ranks at the particular time. In the 12 years between 1980 and 1992 there has been a substantial restructuring of the armed forces to reflect changing requirements, notably those arising from the end of the cold war. This restructuring continues and further proposals may result from the defence costs study which is currently examining all aspects of support to the front line. The Ministry of Defence does not use officer:other ranks ratios as a control mechanism.

Racial Harassment

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he holds centrally of the number of complaints of racial harassment in the armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The Army and Royal Air Force maintain central records of complaints of racial discrimination and ill-treatment involving a racial element. During the period 1 January 1993 to 30 November 1993, there were five such complaints in the Army and two in the Royal Air Force. One complaint in the Army has been resolved and the remaining four are under investigation. Neither of the complaints in the Royal Air Force was substantiated. The Royal Navy expects to introduce a system to record complaints involving a racial element by spring 1994.

Expenditure

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy regarding the release of information on future expenditure plans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Defence expenditure plans are published annually in the Financial Statement and Budget Report and cover the next financial year and the two following.

Arms Transfers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith), of 29 November, Official Report, column 370, what criteria have been agreed with the EC and P5 concerning the export of defence equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: Copies of the EC criteria and P5 guidelines concerning the export of defence equipment have been placed in the Library.

Release of Information

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what policy developments in relation to the release of information have occurred in the last 18 months.

Mr. Hanley: The Ministry of Defence is committed to the open Government initiative, and releases as much information into the public domain as possible without compromising security. Major examples include: the December 1992 announcement that, in future, service board of inquiry reports will be released to next of kin; the ongoing review of closed departmental records to assess suitability for release to the Public Records Office—some 2,500 have been released to date—and the implementation this August, in conjunction with members of the media, of a new defence advisory notices system, replacing the old D notice system. This year's Statement on the Defence Estimates, "Defending Our Future", also represents a significant step forward in increasing openness, giving unprecedented access to the defence planner's perspective and to the way in which force structures are determined.

Light Armoured Vehicles

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent progress has been made on the planned procurement of a new range of light armoured vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: Our future light armoured vehicle programme is still in its early stages. Feasibility studies are currently being carried out by three consortia for a new tactical reconnaissance armoured combat vehicle—TRACER. Our requirements and procurement strategies for other future vehicles have yet to be determined.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions his officials have had with foreign companies regarding the planned procurement of a new range of light armoured vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The most recent discussions about our future light armoured vehicle programme, involving representatives of foreign companies, have been progress meetings between officials and the consortia who are carrying our feasibility studies for the tactical reconnaissance armoured combat equipment requirement—TRACER.

Reserve Forces

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library copies of all of the representations he has received relating to his proposals on new legislation for the reserve forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Our consultative document "Britain's Reserve Forces: A Framework for the Future" was published on 12 October 1993. The period for responses closed on 23 November, but late replies are still arriving. By Monday 6 December, some 133 responses had been received. Many of the letters reveal the private addresses and service affiliations of individuals, and it would therefore be inappropriate to publish them. I will, however, arrange for a factual summary of the responses, supported by appropriate extracts from the replies themselves, to be placed in the Library.

Separately, more than 400 further replies have been received by Sir Alexander Graham, the chairman of the National Employers' Liaison Committee for the Reserve Forces, in response to a request from him to employers for views. He has undertaken to prepare a consolidated response from NELC which will also be placed in the Library.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has regarding the policies of other NATO countries towards their reserve forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The policy of NATO countries towards their reserve forces is a matter for their respective Governments. All member countries, except Iceland which has no armed forces, are able to mobilise their reserve forces in times of crisis and war.

There are, however, regular exchanges of views between representatives of the reserve forces of member countries under the auspices of the Confederation Inter-Alliée des Officiers de Réserve, and between the respective heads of the reserve forces in the National Reserve Forces Committee.

Conservative Party Conference

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what costs were incurred on defence votes in respect of staff from non-Defence Ministers' private offices visiting Blackpool during the Conservative party conference; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: None.

Ethnic Origins

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to monitor the ethnic origins of those leaving the armed forces.

Mr. Hanley: The ethnic origins of personnel leaving the armed forces will be monitored as part of the ethnic monitoring of all regular serving personnel.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), Official Report, 29 November, column 364, if his proposed survey of the ethnic origins of serving personnel will provide a detailed breakdown of (a) rank and (b) regimental or other unit affiliation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: It will be possible to produce a breakdown of the ethnic origins of serving personnel by rank, regiment or unit from the information obtained in the ethnic origin survey. It is our intention to publish a breakdown by service and rank in defence statistics in due course.

Nuclear Tests

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what announcements he has to make about nuclear tests following the United States Government's anouncement on 7 December.

Mr. Aitken: The United Kingdom has carried out no secret nuclear tests. However, a British nuclear test at the Nevada test site on 25 September 1964 did not proceed as planned and did not produce a nuclear yield. For this reason it has not been included in lists of nuclear tests carried out by the United Kingdom.

RAF Training (Germany)

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current training arrangements for the RAF based in Germany, what training areas are used; how many flying hours are planned per month and how many are achieved; how often and where alternative training takes place; and how often training runs fail to take place due to shortage of spares.

Mr. Hanley: I will write to the hon. Member.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 9 December 1993

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Myodil (Compensation)

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will hold an urgent investigation into the legal aid position for those suffering from arachnoiditis following treatment by Myodil and who are seeking compensation from Glaxo.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No. Decisions on individual legal aid applications are entirely a matter for the legal aid board.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

India

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Indian Government following the recent clashes between the Narmada Bachao Andolan and police during peaceful opposition of the surveying of villages due to be submerged in the Narmada valley in India.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are concerned about human rights abuses in India, including the excessive use of force by police. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs regularly raises human rights issues with the Indian Government, most recently in his talks with the Indian Prime Minister on 15 November. We have welcomed the recent establishment of the Indian Human Rights Commission which we hope will look into incidents of this type.

International Disarmament Fund

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has made to President Kravchuk's proposal in January for an international disarmament fund.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have offered Ukraine practical help with missile dismantling, and we have made around £37 million available to help the process of arms reduction in the former Soviet Union. These efforts are closely co-ordinated with other major donors and we do not believe that the creation of an international fund for these purposes would increase the effectiveness of the programmes concerned.

Ukraine

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action the Government are now proposing to take to assist the dismantling and destruction of strategic warheads and intercontinental ballistic missiles in Ukraine.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have offered Ukraine technical help with the safe disposal of toxic liquid fuel from missiles remaining in Ukraine.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications of the exclusion of article V of the Lisbon protocol by the Ukrainian Parliament for the success of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The nuclear non-proliferation treaty, NPT, now has 162 states party—more than any other arms control agreement in history. We deeply regret the Ukrainian Parliament's specific exclusion of article V of the Lisbon protocol in its resolution on the ratification of the strategic arms reduction talks—START 1. We have noted that the Government of Ukraine has affirmed Ukraine's intention to abide by her commitments to non-nuclear weapon status, and we have called upon the Government of Ukraine to take all necessary steps towards full implementation of the START 1 treaty and accession to the NPT, as a non-nuclear weapon state, without further delay.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Next Steps

Mr. Moss: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the progress of the next steps initiative.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government today published the fourth next steps review—Cm 2430. It brings together information on the 92 agencies within government, and the executive organisations of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue which now constitute 60 per cent. of the civil service.

Within central Government, agencies are leaders in delivering the citizens charter commitment to customer service and value for money. The review highlights how the focus on the needs of users has been reinforced and gives examples of what individual agencies have achieved. It reports on the steps taken to enable agencies to deliver improved performance, better value for money and greater openness and accountability by, for example, clarifying the responsibilities of Ministers and chief executives, increased delegation, and sharpening the aims and objectives of agencies; financial arrangements and pay and grading systems which are tailored to the work of individual agencies; and the application of the competing for quality initiative.

The arrangements are therefore now in place to enable agencies to deliver real benefits to customers and the taxpayer and these are becoming increasingly evident. The review reports for Parliament and the public on the targets set for agencies and their performance against them in 1992-93 and lists key targets for 1993-94. In 1992-93 agencies met around 77 per cent. of their key targets. This represents a small improvement over the proportion of targets met last year. In general, targets have been made progressively tougher year on year. However, further progress will have to be made, particularly in the area of efficiency. There is a continuing need for Ministers to ensure that the targets they set are challenging and that they have appropriate arrangements in place for overseeing the performance of their agencies. For both tasks they may need to draw on expert advice.

The Government's aim is that every public service should be provided in the most appropriate and cost-effective way. All the executive functions of the civil service are therefore being tested against the following criteria: first, whether they need to continue to be performed at all; secondly, whether they need to remain the responsibility of Government; thirdly, whether they should be market tested or contracted out; and, fourthly, whether they should become the responsibility of an agency within Government, itself subject to the Government's competing for quality initiative. The review reports substantial further progress in this work.

Once established, agencies are subject to a systematic periodic review, normally after three years of operation. The review lists the current position on these reviews. The Government want to ensure that, in this process, the widest possible range of views are taken into account. In future, therefore, we have decided that reviews will be publicly announced, including through the next steps review, to enable all those with an interest in the agency and its work to contribute to the discussion of its future organisation and status.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensions

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will list the criteria for deciding what amount of any surplus in pension funds of privatised industries are split, once the actuarial assessment of the amount needed to meet the pension benefits of past and present employees has been made;

(2) if he will list the criteria for deciding who receives any surplus of pension funds in privatised industries, after the actuarial assessment of the amount needed to meet the pension benefits of past and present employees has been made.

Mr. Hague: In all occupational pension schemes, including those of privatised industries, the application of any scheme surplus is a matter to be determined in accordance with the terms of the scheme rules. Pension arrangements on privatisation accordingly depend upon the particular circumstances of the scheme concerned.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will issue the discussion papers on occupational pensions that he announced on 3 November; and who they will be available to.

Mr. Hague: The first five papers in a series of discussion papers on non-state pensions were published on 3 December 1993. Copies of the papers have been placed in the Library, sent to interested parties, and are available on request.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has for altering the guidelines given to the Child Support Agency.

Mr. Burt: The Government have always made it clear that the policy will be kept under review. We are looking at the recommendations of the Social Security Select Committee and other comments and concerns which have been raised, and testing them against the basic principles of the child support scheme. If, after examination, we think we can improve the scheme, we will do so.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what the estimated first year running costs of the Child Support Agency are;

(2) what the set-up costs of the Child Support Agency were.

Mr. Burt: The total cost of setting up the Child Support Agency was around £146 million. This figure includes the 1992-93 cost of liable relative work, transferred in April 1992 from the Benefits Agency to the child support unit —as the shadow agency was known before its launch in April 1993.

The costs of the agency in 1993-94 are as follows:

	£ million
Running costs	99·1
Capital	6·8
Other current costs	13·9
Total	119·8

Source: Winter Supplementary Estimate, November 1993.

Disability

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what additional measures have been taken by his Department to assist the operation of the independent tribunal service since the introduction of disability living allowance.

Mr. Scott: I am advised by the independent tribunal service that, since the introduction of disability living allowance, its budget for running costs has been increased by over £21 million. It has been authorised to increase its staff by 357 posts.

Fraud

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are engaged in his Department in combating fraud; and at what annual cost.

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency, to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) on 23 November at columns 83-85.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Communications

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what communications have been received from or sent to any terrorist organisation or Sinn Fein since 29 November.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: For the reasons I explained to the House on 29 November, Official Report, columns 785-812, while it is useful to have a means of communication by which messages could be exchanged indirectly between the Government and the provisional movement, such a chain could function only if its secrecy was respected on both sides. Accordingly, we do not propose to divulge any further information about messages sent or received or to comment further, save to give the assurance that any communications from Her Majesty's Government will be consistent with their publicly stated policies.

Comptroller and Auditor-General

Mr. Roy Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements have been made to appoint a new Comptroller and Auditor-General for Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Her Majesty the Queen has graciously approved the appointment of Mr. John Michael Dowdall as Comptroller and Auditor-General for Northern Ireland in succession to Dr. W. H. Jack CB who is due to retire on 17 February 1994.

WALES

Youth Service

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his policy for the youth service.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 27 April 1993, Official Report, column 363.

I reaffirmed the Welsh Office's continued support for the Welsh youth service in my keynote speech to the national youth service conference in Cardiff on 3 December.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are employed in the youth service in each of the counties of Wales; and how many were in post in 1983.

Sir Wyn Roberts: This information is not collected centrally.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Redwood: My Department does not have a separate unit for handling sensitive documents. This function is subsumed in the general records management operation. A record of the number of such documents is not maintained.

Health Service

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) clerical and administrative staff and (b) nurses and doctors are employed in each of the hospital trusts in Wales; how many clerical and administrative staff are employed in the NHS; and how many were employed in 1990.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information relating to administrative and clerical and nursing and midwifery staff in each NHS trust at 30 September 1993 is given in the table.

The latest information on medical staff in the hospital and community service relates to 30 September 1992. At that time, there were 2,805 medical staff in the NHS in Wales—whole-time equivalents, including eight hospital practitioners and 146 clinical assistants. The equivalent figure for 1990 was 2,634—including 12 hospital practitioners and 138 clinical assistants. In 1992, there was only one NHS trust in Wales—Pembrokeshire—which employed 87 medical staff—including five clinical assistants.

[1] The use of locally devised pay scales from 1991 onwards may affect the comparability of figures as staff on such scales cannot be allocated centrally to a specific staff group and are not, therefore, included above. This particularly affects figures for the Pembrokeshire NHS trust.

[2] May include some managers previously classified in staff groups other than administrative and clerical.

[3] Since 1991 student nurses have been classified as students and are no longer included in the NHS staff figures. Staff included here are students finishing courses started before this date.

[4] Includes staff employed by the Welsh Health Common Services Authority, NHS trusts and those family health service authorities using district health authority payroll systems. Administrative and clerical staff employed by the South East Wales ambulance trust are not included in the 1993 figures.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairmen of the Welsh health authorities and trusts in relation to the signing of contracts between purchasers and providers within this financial year; what guidelines he has issued or will issue in relation to recommended final dates for publishing draft prices for 1994-95; what expectations of advancement he has of the time of signing contracts between purchasers and providers between 1993-94 performance and 1994-95; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Signing contracts is a matter for health authorities and provider units, although early agreement and signature are encouraged.

Following discussions with the NHS in Wales, a timetable for planning services and completing the contracting process was issued in August this year. Health authorities and provider units will be expected to sign contracts in accordance with this published schedule.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to issue his final allocation letter to the health authorities in Wales for the current financial year.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The initial revenue and capital allocations to health authorities for 1993-94 were announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 4 March, Official Report, columns 252-58, and this was followed by detailed allocations from the director of the national health service in Wales on 10 March.

Allocations are always subject to adjustment throughout the financial year as funding is released for centrally sponsored developments.

The latest allocation adjustments were notified to health authorities on 15 November. Further adjustments will be issued during the remainder of the year as provision held in reserve for centrally funded service developments is claimed by authorities.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the proportion of imports and exports for each year through Welsh sea ports, contained at table 6.12 of the "Digest of Welsh Statistics" 1993, page 103, which comprise hazardous or toxic wastes.

Mr. Redwood: As information on the import of hazardous waste is available only from 1988, figures for 1981 comparable to the data given in table 6.12 of the "Digest of Welsh Statistics" cannot be supplied. Data for 1990, 1991 and 1992 are shown in the table. Information on the export of hazardous waste is not collected centrally.

Forestry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of the freedom to roam on any forestry land currently available in the forests and woods of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: We have no plans to change our policy of allowing "freedom to roam" on forestry land managed by the Forestry Commission. Arrangements have been in place since October 1991 to secure continued public access to Forestry Commission woodlands in the event of their disposal, through the commission offering local authorities the opportunity to enter into access arrangements prior to sale.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the value of the forests of the Forestry Commission in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The latest published valuation of the Forestry Commission's forests, as at 31 March 1992, included a figure of £632·8 million for its forests in Wales. An estimate of the value of the forests at 31 March 1993 will be published in the commission's annual report and accounts early in the new year, once the accounts have been examined and certified by the Comptroller and Auditor General.

Shell Fishing

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what arrangements exist for examining the environmental implications of licence authorisations for shell fishing in inshore waters.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Under the terms of the Sea Fisheries (Wildlife Conservation) Act 1992, Ministers and sea fisheries committees are required, in discharging their functions to have regard to the conservation of marine flora and fauna.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of tonnes of cockles harvested since 8 October from Traeth Lafan, Conwy bay, and the proportion taken from the site of special scientific interest.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This is a matter for the North Western and North Wales sea fisheries committee.

Grant-Maintained Schools

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the grant-maintained schools and those schools seeking grant-maintained status in each of the local education authorities of Wales, giving the amount of extra cash grants for each of the grant-maintained schools; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

[2] Proposals currently under consideration.

As regards the funding of grant-maintained schools, I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply of 6 December 1993, Official Report, column 47.

New Hospital, Cardiff

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the South Glamorgan health authority in relation to the proposed construction of a new neighbourhood hospital on the site of the closed St. David's hospital, Riverside, Cardiff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None.

Training and Enterprise

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much he plans to spend on training and enterprise in Wales in 1994-95.

Mr. Redwood: I plan to spend over £147 million on training and enterprise in Wales in 1994-95. This provides for anticipated levels of training demand to be met and for the introduction of a modern apprenticeship scheme in manufacturing engineering. Detailed allocations to particular programmes will be made in due course.

Teacher Training

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many students were recruited to courses of intial teacher training in Wales in 1993.

Sir Wyn Roberts: A survey undertaken by the Department shows that, in Wales, 2,573 students entered courses of initial teacher training this year, an increase of nearly 5 per cent. over 1992. Recruitment to primary courses was about the same as last year, but recruitment to secondary courses was up by almost 15 per cent. I welcome in particular the increase in secondary intakes as many of these students are pursuing courses in the shortage areas including Welsh.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the Ministers in his Department who since June 1987 have visited (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malaysia, (c) Singapore and (d) South Africa on official business; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

Sir John Cope: The Economic Secretary visited Kuala Lumpur to attend a meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers from 7 to 11 October 1991. No party political activities were included in the visit.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much the Treasury has received from capital gains tax in each year since 1979; and how much capital gains tax has cost to collect in each of those years.

Mr. Dorrell: The figures for capital gains tax yield and the costs of administering the tax for each year since 1979 are:

£ million

	Capital gains tax[1]
	Net receipts	Cost of administration[2]
1979-80	431	9·5
1980-81[3]	508	13·2
1981-82[3]	526	13·7
1982-83	632	15·3
1983-84	671	14·7
1984-85	730	14·2
1985-86	908	15·4
1986-87	1,064	17·7
1987-88	1,379	25·1
1988-89	2,323	26·6
1989-90	1,854	34·3
1990-91[4]	1,852	39·0
1991-92[4]	1,140	43·3
1992-93[4]	982	38·4

[1] The figures quoted exclude tax on gains made by companies included in corporation tax. Some of the costs associated with companies, however, cannot be separately identified and are therefore included in the cost figures for capital gains tax rather than for corporation tax.

[2] Costs are based on total departmental expenditure.

[3] The breakdown of receipts between 1980-81 and 1981-92 is estimated. The receipts figures for both years were affected by industrial action between March 1981 and July 1981.

[4] Manpower usage and costs of administration for 1989-90 have been adjusted to reflect a new basis of costing. Direct comparison of these and later figures with those of earlier years may be misleading. More detail regarding this adjustment is given in the board's report for the year ending 31 March 1991.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the reduction in annual liability to capital gains tax, in 1993-94 as against the 1978-79 indexed regime, specifying in each case the total and average reduction per taxpayer as well as the number of taxpayers in each year, in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: I regret that the requested estimates of the difference between the capital gains tax liability on the current regime and on the 1978-79 indexed regime are not available, as indicated in my replies to the hon. Member on 25 February 1992, Official Report, columns 435-36, and 15 March 1991, Official Report, columns 700-701.

The number of capital gains taxpayers with liabilities in 1993-94 under the current tax regime, excluding gains realised by companies is estimated at 110,000.

Economic Growth

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the principles upon which he is basing his strategy for economic growth.

Mr. Nelson: Economic growth is generated by businesses and their employees, not by Governments. The Government's responsibility is to ensure that markets work properly and that the regulatory and tax burden on business is kept to a minimum. It also has the essential task of establishing a macroeconomic framework which provides the stability that businesses need to plan for the future. The Government therefore direct monetary and fiscal policy towards two key objectives: low inflation on a permanent basis and sound public finances.

Taxation

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest estimates of how many people with gross incomes of over £100,000 pay (a) a national insurance contributions bill and (b) a total income tax and national insurance contributions bill, of less than (i) 35 per cent., (ii) 30 per cent., (iii) 25 per cent., (iv) 20 per cent., (v) 15 per cent., (vi) 10 per cent. and (vii) 5 per cent. of their gross incomes, in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: Available figures relate to the estimated 180,000 taxpayers in 1993-94 with gross incomes of £80,000 and above. Nearly all these taxpayers pay less than 5 per cent. of their gross income in national insurance contributions. Estimates of combined income tax and national insurance contribution liabilities are that 70,000 have an effective rate above 35 per cent, 90,000 have an effective rate between 30 and 35 per cent., 10,000 have an effective rate between 25 and 30 per cent., and the remaining 10,000 have an effective rate below 25 per cent.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for how many people who pay tax have earnings below the upper earnings limit in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: It is estimated that in 1993-94 about 16·5 million tax-paying employees have earnings below the upper earnings limit.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has as to how much tax remained uncollected at the end of the last fiscal year; and what estimate he has as to the amount which will remain uncollected at the end of the current year.

Mr. Dorrell: The amount of tax which remained uncollected at the end of October 1992, the last year for which figures are available, is £3·737 billion.

These figures are produced for the Inland Revenue's accounting year, to 31 October, rather than on a fiscal year basis.

Estimates for the year ended October 1993 will not be available until the end of January 1994.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people paid tax in each year since 1978-79, giving the numbers on basic rate and higher rate tax.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates for 1991-92 onwards based on a projection of the survey of personal incomes are given.

Figures for earlier years are available in table 2.1 of Inland Revenue Statistics 1993.

Millions

	Taxpayers liable at
	Lower rate only	Basic rate but not higher rate	Higher rate	Total
1991-92	0·0	24·1	1·6	25·7
1992-93	3·9	19·4	1·8	25·1
1993-94	4·8	18·4	1·9	25·1

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families with children are estimated to have taxable incomes below the income tax threshold; and what proportion this represents of all families with children.

Mr. Dorrell: It is estimated that in 1993-94 approximately 1·9 million single parents and married couples with children have no income tax liability. These represent about a quarter of all families with children.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total yield from VAT in 1978-79.

Sir John Cope: The yield from VAT in the financial year 1978-79 was £4,837·5 million.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much he estimates the average family's tax bill will rise following the VAT changes outlined in the March 1993 Budget.

Sir John Cope: Standard rate VAT on domestic fuel and power applied to the average household's existing fuel bill would cost about £2·30 a week.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the proportion of consumer spending subject to the standard rate of VAT, exempt from VAT and subject to a zero rate of VAT.

Sir John Cope: The latest data show that some 58 per cent. of consumer spending is standard rated, 24 per cent. is exempt and 18 per cent. is subject to a zero rate of VAT.

Non-taxpayers

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for how many (a) working and (b) non-working people do not pay tax in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: Of the estimated 21 million people aged 16 or over who are non-taxpayers in 1993-94 about 3·6 million are working and 17·4 million are non-working.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many single people and married couples do not currently pay tax.

Mr. Dorrell: It is estimated that in 1993-94 there are about 8·9 million single people aged over 16 not liable to income tax and about 3·8 million married couples where neither spouse is liable to tax.

Allowances

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people receive (a) the married couple's allowance, (b) the additional person's allowance and (c) the widow's bereavement allowance.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates are in the table:

Number of individuals benefiting from allowance in 1993-94

	(Thousands)
Married couple's allowance	10,200
Additional personal allowance	750
Widow's bereavement allowance	150

Visible Trade

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit on visible trade for the first seven months of the year compared with the same period in 1992.

Mr. Nelson: The latest information is available in the Central Statistical Office first release balance of United Kingdom visible trade—August 1993, 12 November 1993. It is also available on the CSO database, which can be accessed through the House of Commons Library; the identifier is AIMA.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sanction exists in respect of inheritance tax waived in respect of works of art to be made available to the public when the works are not so made available.

Mr. Dorrell: The owner of works of art which are conditionally exempt from inheritance tax must undertake to preserve them, keep them in the United Kingdom and provide reasonable public access. If an owner breaks an undertaking and the issue cannot be resolved in discussion between the Inland Revenue and the owner, inheritance tax is charged on the current value of the works of art. This provides a powerful incentive for the owner to honour the terms of the undertakings.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total inheritance tax yield, in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in the latest year for which information is available.

Mr. Dorrell: The latest year for which information is available is 1992-93. Inheritance tax net receipts in this year were £1,211 million for the United Kingdom, of which £86 million was collected in Northern Ireland. Much of the tax collected in Northern Ireland related to deaths in England and Wales.

Cigarettes

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average cost of a packet of cigarettes, and the average amount of total tax on a packet of cigarettes, in the last financial year.

Sir John Cope: The available data are for a typical packet of cigarettes. Two prices applied in the financial year 1992-93 as manufacturers increased their prices in the autumn. Both prices are given in the table.

Period covered	Typical price (pence)	Tax content (pence)
April to October	221	168
November to March	227	170

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount of tax received from cigarettes in the last financial year.

Sir John Cope: Receipts of excise duty and value added tax on cigarettes are estimated to have been £6,970 million in 1992-93.

Privatised Companies

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish those numbers of individual shareholders retaining shares in each of the concerns privatised since 1979, indicating where Her Majesty's Government have retained a shareholding.

Mr. Dorrell: The table shows the latest figures available for shareholdings in privatised companies. Where the Government retained a shareholding—including details of any subsequent disposals—this has also been shown.

[1] For single company privatisations, these figures are not an exact guide to the number of shareholders because some shareholdings are held jointly in more than one name —for example, for members of employee share schemes only the trustees are shown on share registers.

[2] Her Majesty's Government obtained a majority holding in 1914 but this never reached 100 per cent. The 1977 sale is shown as the first disposal of recent times.

[3] Where the largest register of shareholdings was not immediately following privatisation—this usually followed a secondary offer.

[4] These proportions do not sum to 51 per cent. because of rights issues.

[5] Subsidiary of BL plc.

[6] The offer allowed for holdings by individuals in any or all of the companies in the offer and therefore holders may appear on more than one register.

[7] Shareholders may appear on the register of more than one company.

[8] The offer required public applicants to apply for shares in both companies and the figure shown is that of allocation in the offer.

[9] The offer required non-customer public applicants to apply for shares in both companies and the figure shown is that of allocation in the offer.

Personal Pensions

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what study his Department has made of compliance by the personal pension sector with the Financial Services Act 1986 as it affects the selling of pensions; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what estimate he has as to the number of people who were advised to transfer to a personal pension and would have been better off to have remained in occupational schemes since 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 8 December, Official Report, column 234.

Finance Bill

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Finance Bill will be published.

Mr. Dorrell: The Finance Bill will be published on Tuesday 11 January 1994.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Members

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), representing the Church Commissioners, which Church Commissioners are also members of Her Majesty's Government; and which meetings of the commissioners, on how many occasions, were attended by each such member in the last three calendar years.

Mr. Alison: Seven out of 95 Church Commissioners are members of Her Majesty's Government: the Lord Chancellor; the First Lord of the Treasury; the Lord President of the Council; the Secretary of State for the Home Department; the Chancellor of the Exchequer; the Attorney-General; and the Solicitor-General. The Lord President of the Council attended the commissioners' annual general meeting in 1991 and 1993. The Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General attended that meeting in 1992.

The Second Church Estates Commissioner is included under the heading "Her Majesty's Government" in the list which appears from time to time in Hansard, but the appointment is not an executive Government post and it carries no salary.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Overseas Visits

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the Ministers in his Department who since June 1987 have visited (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malaysia, (c) Singapore and (d) South Africa on official business; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

Mr. Howard: The following official visits have been made, during none of which do we have any record that party political activities were undertaken:

(a) Saudi Arabia
The right hon. Douglas Hurd CBE MP— Home Secretary —
April 1989.
(b) Malaysia
None.
(c) Singapore
The right hon. and noble Earl Ferrers—Minister of State—
31 December 1991 to 3 January 1992.
(d) South Africa

None.

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with prison governors in England and Wales on the recent policy statements that he has made as to the running of penal establishments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 3 November, my right hon. and learned Friend made a speech about imprisonment to the Prison Service conference, to which senior governors are invited. My right hon. and learned Friend also discussed prison issues with governors during visits to Prison Service establishments.

Justice Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what matters were discussed and what decisions were taken at the Justice Council in Brussels on 29 to 30 November.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I refer to the answer which I gave the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 7

Manchester United Supporters

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what report he has received from the Greater Manchester police about the treatment of Manchester United fans in Turkey; and if he will make the findings public.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I have seen a copy of an internal document prepared by the Greater Manchester police officers who were present in Turkey as part of the normal liaison arrangements which occur when English teams play abroad. It includes many references to individuals which it would not be right to make public.

We have passed on copies of the relevant parts of the report to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has written to the Turkish authorities taking up some of the points which have been raised by those who were detained in and deported from Turkey.

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of people employed, (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

Mr. Howard: The figures requested are given in the table which sets out, by grade, the total number of non-industrial Home Office staff, including those in agencies, on outward secondment or on maternity or special leave, and the number of respondents belonging to black or Asian ethnic groupings. The current response rates to ethnic surveys is 85 per cent. for the main Home Office and 99 per cent. for the Prison Service; the latter includes management classification. The answer does not include those respondents in other ethnic minorities. The information was generated from the Home Office personnel system on 6 December 1993.

Mentally Disordered Prisoners

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what effect periods spent in hospitals for the mentally disordered has on the original sentence of category A prisoners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Any period of time spent in hospital by a prisoner transferred there under the Mental Health Act 1983 counts towards the serving of the sentence of imprisonment imposed by the court in his case.

Police Investigations

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce arrangements to compensate county police forces which incur exceptional costs in the course of official investigations into other police forces.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No. Arrangements already allow for a police force's cost in conducting an investigation on behalf of another force to be covered by the force concerned. The costs are determined between the respective chief officers.

Rukhasana Tufail Fakir

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the case of Rukhasana Tufail Fakir.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Mrs. Tufail has applied to the Court of Appeal for leave to move for judicial review of the decision to deport her. Her case will be reviewed in the light of the outcome of these proceedings and any further representations made on her behalf.

Financial Fraud

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are engaged in his Department in combating fraud in financial institutions; and at what annual cost.

Mr. Maclean: No officials in my Department are directly so engaged. The Home Office is responsible for the criminal law as it relates to fraudulent activity, but it has no direct involvement in its investigation or prosecution.

Dogs

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to require owners of breeds of dogs involved in serious attacks on children and adults to muzzle such dogs when in a public place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 provides that all exempted dogs—that is, fighting dogs such as the pit bull terrier—must be muzzled when in a public place. The Act also gives the courts powers to impose a muzzling order on a dog of any breed or type which they judge potentially or actually dangerous.

In addition, my right hon. and learned Friend has a reserve power under section 2 of the Act to impose restrictions relating to muzzling, leashing and abandoning any breed or type of dog which, after having taken advice, he considers presents a serious danger to the public. The need to use this power is kept under review.

Market Testing

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used to select a Home Office function for market testing.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Home Office approach to market testing accords with Government policy as set out in the White Paper "Competing for Quality: Buying Better Public Services", Cm 1730. Priority is being given to market-testing activities where the costs are substantial and it seems likely that comparable services could be provided satisfactorily by external suppliers under contract.

Prison Visits

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many queries from the police and probation service were processed by the prisoner location unit in Birmingham during the last four weeks for which figures are available; and what was the average time taken to process each application;

(2) how many complaints were received from members of the public about the processing of prison visit applications in the year prior to the establishment of the assisted prison visits unit;

(3) what additional resources will be made available in the next financial year to investigate possible fraudulent claims at the assisted prison visits unit;

(4) how many staff were employed at the assisted prison visits unit in Birmingham;

(5) when sufficient resources will be made available to the assisted prison visits unit to pay applicants twice per month;

(6) when the assisted prison visits unit records will be computerised;

(7) how many applications were dealt with last year by the assisted prison visits unit; and what is the average time taken to process each application;

(8) how many complaints were received from the public about the processing of the assisted prison visits unit applications last year;

(9) what checks are currently made to detect fraudulent claims at the assisted prison visits unit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the operation of the Assisted Prison Visits Unit, including the Prisoner Location Unit.

The Assisted Prison Visits Unit (APVU) currently operates with 37 members of staff, five of whom are dedicated to work arising on the Prisoner Location Unit. The APVU processed 79,370 applications last year with an average turn round time of seven working days. The Prisoner Location Unit received 4,263 calls from the police and the probation service during November 1993. On average the Unit took 24 hours to process each claim, although the vast majority were dealt with on the same day.

Current administrative procedures provide that there should be systematic checks with prison establishments to confirm that visits have been made, and with the Benefits Agency to ensure that applicants qualify on low income. Where evidence of any fraudulent claim comes to light these are referred to the police for investigation. The advent of computerisation within the APVU, the first phase of which is scheduled to come on line in March 1994, will enhance the detection of fraudulent claims and their investigation.

You also ask about the proposed extension of the Assisted Visits scheme to cover the second statutory monthly payment. The White Paper "Custody, Care and Justice" includes a commitment to consider extensions of the scheme as resources allow. We have also indicated in the Prison Service Business plan that the extension should take place this financial year. No final decision on this matter has been taken. It will be necessary to do so in the light of the resources available to the Prison Service and it is not possible to say when payment of the second monthly visit will be initiated.

Lastly, you also ask about the number of complaints which were received from members of the public in the year prior to this function being transferred from the then DHSS to the Prison Service and similarly, the number of complaints from the public about processing of applications which the APVU received last year. I am afraid that we do not have any records relating to the performance of the DHSS. Statistics on the number of complaints received by the APVU are not held in the form requested and could be obtained only by inspecting individual case files.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 will apply to the market testing of the assisted prison visits unit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretory has asked me to reply to your recent Question about whether the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 will apply to the market testing of the Assisted Prisons Visits Unit.

We have identified the Unit as one of our candidates for market testing. Work on a scoping study, which is the first stage in the process, will start in the new year. This will examine in detail the suitability or otherwise of the Assisted Prisons Visits Unit for competitive tendering against the private sector. If competitive tendering follows we will expect bidders to consider the implications of the Regulations.

As in all market tests, whether the Regulations apply will depend on the circumstances of the particular case and the way that bidders respond to the invitation to tender. To assist in this the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster issued advice on the application of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 on 11 March 1993 (HWA col. 648).

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria were used to select the assisted prison visits unit and the prisoner location unit for market testing.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the criteria used to select the Assisted Prisons Visits Unit and the Prisoner Location Unit for market testing.

The White Paper 'Competing for Quality' identified promising areas for market testing. These included such functions as payment of grants, grant administration and advisory services. APVU, which at present subsumes the Prisoner Location Unit, carries out these functions.

A scoping study due to start in the new year will examine the suitability or otherwise of the Unit for competitive tendering.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the scoping report into the proposed market test of the assisted prison visits unit will be made available to staff.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about whether the Scoping Report into the proposed market test of the Assisted Prisons Visits Unit will be made available to staff.

Staff in the Unit will be consulted fully throughout the scoping study and a copy of the scoping study report will be made available to them.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the decision was made to market test the assisted prison visits unit; and when the staff association was informed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about when the decision was made to market test the Assisted Prisons Visits Unit; and when the Staff Association was informed.

The Prisons Board Executive Committee decided on 26 July 1993 to include the Assisted Prisons Visits Unit as one of our candidates for market testing. Staff in the Unit were told by their Head of Division on 6 August 1993. Prison Service Trades Unions and Staff Associations were advised at the same time. This has been followed up with briefing by senior line management and our Market Testing Section.

Work on the first stage of the process will start in the new year. This will examine in detail the suitability, or otherwise, of APVU for competitive tendering against the private sector.

Primates

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the areas of research or categories of product involving the use of primates in (a) toxicity and (b) non-toxicity tests for the intention of registration of medical or dental products under the Medicines Act 1968 and equivalent international legislation in 1992;

(2) what assessment he has made of the increase in the number of primates used in scientific procedures required by the Medicines Act 1968 and the equivalent international legislation during 1992.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answers 7 December 1993]: The increase in the number of primates used in scientific procedures in 1992 was attributable principally to a general increase in the number of pharmaceutical products submitted for chronic toxicity testing.

Total numbers of primates used increased from 4,518 in 1991 to 5,018 in 1992, as shown in table 14 of the "Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals in Great Britain 1992", Cm 2356.

Table 7 provides information on procedures for toxicity tests on the basis of broad areas and relates to the use of animals in the final stages of regulatory testing when the purpose is to identify any unexpected or adverse effects in body systems immediately prior to use of medicine by humans.

Table 4 relates to information presented to regulatory authorities and derived from animal testing at an earlier stage of product development.

To list individual areas of research or categories of product would be in breach of the requirement of section 24(1) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 which provides for the protection of confidential information.

Citizenship Applications

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the current duties of police detective officers in the processing of British citizenship applications; what is his estimate of the total police time devoted to these duties in the current year to date; and what plans he has to transfer these duties to other staff.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 7 December 1993]: The duties of police officers are to interview where necessary on behalf of the Home Office applicants for naturalisation and their referees in order to help determine whether the statutory requirements for citizenship are met and whether discretion should be exercised to grant it. The amount of police time spent on these duties is currently being collated and I shall write to the hon. Member. Consideration is currently being given to the feasibility of the nationality division conducting a proportion of these interviews itself.

HEALTH

Management Costs

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to reduce the management costs of health authorities and trusts.

Dr. Mawhinney: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced proposals for streamlining the structure and slimming down the management of the national health service outside hospital provider units. NHS trusts are free to determine the mix of staff required to deliver services but must do so within what they can afford from health care contracts.

Primary Care

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has for developing equal opportunities in primary care; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Family health services authorities continue to make good progress with the Opportunity 2000 initiative. Their action plans are submitted to regional health authorities and have concerned their own directly employed staff. We believe that the principles of Opportunity 2000 can be pursued to good effect within general medical practice. Although general practitioners are independent contractors and responsible for their own staff, they may look to FHSAs for support and expertise.

Steroids

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths of children were caused or partially caused by steroids in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: In the last five years one report of a fatality in a child has been received by the Committee on Safety of Medicines, through the United Kingdom's voluntary spontaneous adverse drug reaction reporting scheme, in association with corticosteroid therapy. The receipt of a report does not necessarily indicate that a specific drug caused the reaction, as many other factors may have contributed.

Smear Tests

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of women currently receive the results of a smear test within one month; and what is (a) the average and (b) the longest time for receiving the results for those cases outside of one month.

Mr. Sackville: Information is not available centrally in the form requested. Health authorities must aim to return the results of cervical smear tests to the doctor who undertook them within one month. The most recent review indicates that, in most cases, health authorities are meeting the one-month target time for cervical smear reporting.

General Practitioners

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will make a statement on the creation of incentives for general practitioners to work in the inner city;

(2) what plans she has to encourage (a) women general practitioners and (b) general practitioners generally into working in the inner city.

Dr. Mawhinney: The 1990 general practitioner contract introduced the deprivation payments scheme in recognition of the potential higher work load faced by GPs in urban areas. The contract also introduced explicit recognition for part-time working and job-sharing arrangements to assist doctors, including women, who wish to combine a career in general practice with other commitments.

As outlined in "Making London Better", we are currently exploring the scope for more flexible approaches to general medical services within the London initiative zone, including arrangements to strengthen the recruitment of GPs. We will assess subsequently the potential for wider application of any new arrangements which are introduced.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to adjust allocation of budgets given to general practitioner budget holders to take into account census and household survey data.

Dr. Mawhinney: General practitioner fundholder budget setting guidance for 1994-95 is given in EL(93) 93, a copy of which is available in the Library. Work is being undertaken to identify any new data which may usefully be taken account of in future guidance.

Abortions

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many abortions were performed on a private fee-paying basis in 1991 in each region;

(2) how many abortions were performed on a private fee-paying basis by regional health authority in each year from 1985 to 1990.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is published in "Abortion Statistics", Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, AB Nos. 12-18, table 20, copies of which are available in the Library.

Carbon Monoxide Poisoning

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths per year are caused by carbon monoxide poisoning.

Mr. Sackville: This information is shown in the table.

NHS Charges

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were national health service items for which a charge was made; and what was the revenue from charges in England in each of the last five years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The available information is shown in the table.

Charged national health service items and revenue from charges (£ million) in England between 1988 and 1993

	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93

Family health service dental treatment	290·6	366·2	379·7	404·0	394·8
Road traffic accidents	8·7	9·3	9·1	[1]—	[1]—

[1] Information about revenue from road traffic accident charges has not been available centrally since 1990-91.

All national health service sight tests are free of charge. People who are entitled to help with the cost of spectacles receive this in the form of a spectacle voucher; the sale of spectacles is always a private transaction between patient and practitioner, even when an NHS voucher is used. Information about hospital prescriptions, the hospital eye service, and hospital orthotic services is not available centrally.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide details of estimates of receipts from NHS charges broken down by category of charge for 1994-95.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information for 1994-95 will be published in the Department of Health's main Supply estimates in March 1994.

Incontinence Pads

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give the number of purchasers that are restricting either the number of incontinence pads per patient or the total number of incontinence pads.

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

NHS Chairmen

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the range of remuneration of the chairmen of boards of NHS health authorities and trusts for each of the last three years; and what is their projected income for the next year.

Dr. Mawhinney: The range of remuneration for chairmen of boards of national health service health authorities and trusts from April 1990 is shown in the table.

Chairmen volunteered to forgo any increase during the period when public sector pay settlements were restricted to the range of zero to 1·5 per cent. No decision has yet been made on future increases.

NHS Numbers

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to issue patients with NHS numbers.

Mr. Sackville: Every United Kingdom resident is issued with a national health service number. This happens either when the birth of a child is registered or when someone who comes to live here seeks to register with a general practitioner.

From July 1995 the NHS number will be issued in a new format suited to its wider use to identify patients within the NHS. This replacement number will continue to appear on the medical card patients receive when they register with a GP.

Junior Doctors

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what changes she plans to the new deal for junior doctors following publication of the Winyard report.

Dr. Mawhinney: We remain committed to implementing the "New Deal on Junior Doctors' Hours", copies of which are available in the Library.

Out-patients

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the changes in levels of out-patient attendance nationally in 1991-92 and 1992-93; and what assessment she has made of the connections between this and the development of primary care.

Mr. Sackville: There was a 1·7 per cent. increase in the number of out-patient attendances in England between 1991-92 and 1992-93.

The Government have identified a number of national health service priorities for research relating to the relationship between primary and secondary care. One of these priority areas is the appropriateness of out-patient follow-up, which accounts for the majority of all out-patient attendances. The role of primary care in reducing unnecessary out-patient attendances is among these areas to be explored.

Insulin Cartridges

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost of cartridges for use with insulin pens; and what action she is taking to ensure that general practitioner fundholders are able equally with non-fundholders to continue to prescribe insulin cartridges for use with pen devices.

Dr. Mawhinney: The cost of a pack of five insulin cartridges ranges from £6.44 to £27. All cartridges are available on national health service prescription and, therefore, all general practitioners including fundholders are able to prescribe them.

Terminal Care

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of doctors specialising in terminal care in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: The available information is shown in the table.

Doctors specialising in palliative medicine (terminal care)
by whole-time equivalents
England—at 30 September

Year	All doctors in palliative medicine
1989	22·2
1990	26·3
1991	31·2
1992	55·5

Notes:

Statistics on the number of doctors specialising in palliative medicine were collected for the first time in 1989.

In addition, doctors in anaesthetics, radiology and the surgical specialties will also have a role in terminal care in terms of pain relief and life-prolonging surgery.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of nurses specialising in terminal care in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Coronary Care

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many coronary care beds and high-dependency beds there were in England in each of the last 14 years.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. A study into intensive care provision showed that in 1991-92 there were at least 356 high-dependency beds and at least 879 coronary care unit beds in England; this is the only year for which such information is held centrally.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the difference between an acute ward and a coronary care unit; and what research has been undertaken in relation to outcome for patients with the same heart condition placed on these two types of wards.

Mr. Sackville: An acute ward is a medical ward taking the range of medical admissions. A coronary care unit is a small ward specially staffed and equipped for the care of acutely ill patients who have suffered or are suspected of having suffered a heart attack. Any hospital that takes acute admissions will have coronary care facilities, and if a patient needing those facilities cannot be accommodated in a coronary care unit for any reason they will normally be accommodated in an acute medical ward where they will receive the same treatment and care as they would in a coronary care unit. No information is available centrally of any study into outcomes for patients with the same heart condition placed on these two types of wards.

Cancer Patients

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to ensure that cancer patients are included in clinical trials in the national health service; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The national health service supports cancer research funded by a number of bodies including the Medical Research Council which receives its grant in aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and cancer charities. The recruitment of patients to clinical trials is a matter for those conducting and funding individual studies. The funding and support of research and development in the NHS are currently under review.

NHS Registers

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what items of personal data will be contained in NHS registers; whether the computers containing such registers will be linked; what statutory protection will be afforded to the registers; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The national health service administrative register will consolidate information held today by the NHS in England and Wales, to facilitate seamless health care provision and support the business needs of health service bodies.

The register will comprise a number of networked, locally managed databases and will contain basic administrative details only such as name, age, address, sex, NHS number and name of the family doctor.

There will be no statutory regulations governing the register; access to and use of the register is being determined in consultation with the clinical professions and in conformance with the Data Protection Act 1988.

NHS Trusts

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many non-executive directors of trusts have not been given a further term; and how many have voluntarily stood down in 1991, 1992 and 1993.

Dr. Mawhinney: The number of non-executive directors of national health service trusts who have not been appointed for a further term, for whatever reason, or who have voluntarily stood down, in 1991, 1992 and 1993 is as follows:

Year	Number
1991	1
1992	31
1993	51

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which element of the rationalisation of national health service trust facilities at Aintree, Liverpool is being put out for private tender.

Mr. Sackville: The Aintree hospitals national health service trust has recently gone out to open tender for a 100-bed low dependency unit, a conference suite and a kitchen and dining complex.

Asthma (Pollution)

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 1 December, Official Report, column 587, when she expects the findings of the sub-group of the Committee on the Medical Effects on Air Pollutants, investigating the links between asthma and air pollution to be published.

Mr. Sackville: The work of the Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants' sub-group on asthma and air pollution is at an early stage. It is therefore difficult to predict with accuracy when it will be able to publish its report, but it hopes to be in a position to do so in the late summer or autumn of 1994.

Admiral Sir Godfrey Milton-Thompson

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was paid to Admiral Sir Godfrey Milton-Thompson in the out-of-court settlement.

Dr. Mawhinney: An ex-gratia payment of £12,500 was made to Sir Godfrey Milton-Thompson in order to settle legal proceedings. The settlement carried with it no admission of any liability.

City and East London Family and Community Health Services Unit

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations she has had with the North East Thames regional health authority prior to the establishment of the City and East London family and community health services unit; if she will give its terms of reference; if she will give the names of its chairman, board and principal officials; to whom it is accountable; if she intends it to assume the responsibilities of the family health service authority for its area; and if it will be eligible for future trust status.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply by letter of 30 November—copies of which are available in the Library—in response to his earlier question about the City and East London family and community services.

Departmental officials have been in discussion with North East Thames regional health authority about CELFACHS. In respect of community health responsibilities, CELFACHS is a directly managed unit, accountable to East London and the City health authority. As such, it does not have a chairman or a management board. Its project director is Ms Hilary Scott. She is also to be employed by the family health services authority, whose responsibilities remain unchanged. Through these arrangements, CELFACHS will support the district and family health authorities in co-ordinating the management of family and community health services and in considering possible national health service trust configurations in east London. Whether or not any unit is eligible for trust status depends on compliance with relevant legislation governing NHS trusts and successful completion of the rigorous assessment process.

Hospital League Tables

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what categories of measurement are to be used for the compilation of hospital league tables;

(2) what statistical or other techniques will be used in judging outcomes for use in hospital league tables.

Dr. Mawhinney: The chief executive of the national health service management executive has asked NHS hospitals and ambulance authorities, in an executive letter, dated 20 July 1993—EL(93)64—copies of which are available in the Library, to provide information on the following categories:

Accident and Emergency

The percentage of patients seen and assessed for treatment within five minutes of arriving in the accident and emergency department.

Out-patient Appointments

The percentage of patients seen within 30 minutes of their out-patient appointment time.

Day Surgery

The percentage of elective episodes—waiting list and booked—by selected procedures for NHS patients not requiring an overnight stay. The indicator is based on the first episode in the provider spell.

Waiting Times

The percentage of NHS patients by selected specialties admitted within three months and within 12 months of being put on a waiting list.

Operations

The number of patients not admitted within a month of their second cancelled operation.

Ambulance Speed of Response

The percentage of emergency—999 calls—ambulances arriving within 14 minutes—urban area—or 19 minutes—rural area.

Statistical or other techniques to be used in judging outcomes for use in hospital league tables are still under discussion.

Chaplaincy Facilities

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been issued by her Department to NHS purchasing bodies regarding the need to ensure adequate provision of chaplaincy facilities for those patients who require them.

Mr. Sackville: Guidance issued in January 1992, HSG(92)2, copies of which are available in the Library, reminded purchasing authorities and provider units of the need to make adequate provision for the spiritual needs of patients and staff.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost to health authorities and general practitioner fundholders of a visit by an NHS hospital chaplain to one patient.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Health Education Authority

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to announce the results of the review of the Health Education Authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: The final report of the review of the Health Education Authority undertaken by Mr. John Lee and his team is expected shortly.

Prisoners (HIV)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list each Department of Health commissioned study of HIV prevalence among prison inmates.

Mr. Sackville: To date, only one Department of Health funded study has taken place and was commissioned jointly with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. This was an anonymised survey of HIV prevalence in three London prisons and took place earlier this year. The results will be published as soon as possible.

Job Seeker's Allowance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to exempt claimants of the proposed job seeker's allowance from prescription and dental charges (a) for the first six months after they first claim the allowance and (b) for the next six months.

Dr. Mawhinney: No decision has yet been made.

AIDS

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information she has as to research into the spreading of AIDS through insect bites.

Mr. Sackville: The possibility that biting insects could be involved in the transmission of HIV has been raised many times in the past. The evidence from epidemiology and knowledge of the ways in which insects bite and transmit other infectious agents indicate that insects play no part in this process.

Epidemiological studies in Africa and in the United States have investigated the hypothesis that HIV is spread by insects and found no evidence to support it. In addition, there is no evidence that hepatitis B, which has similar epidemiological features to HIV, can be transmitted by mosquitoes.

Laboratory experiments have been unable to demonstrate replication of HIV in bed bugs or mosquitoes. Thus biological transmission, where the virus multiplies in the insect and is injected into a person when bitten, would not be possible. The possibility of mechanical transmission, by which the insect transfers fresh blood directly from one person to another when interrupted during feeding, is thought to be remote because the proboscis or mouth of the insect would not hold sufficient blood to provide an infectious dose of virus.

NHS Supplies Authority

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been (a) the total cost of the new corporate look given to the NHS Supplies Authority and (b) the cost for (i) stationery, (ii) publications, (iii) signage and (iv) livery.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 6 December 1993]: The cost of the logo design was £5,500.

Stationery artwork for 176 relevant sites amounted to £61,000—£367 per site—publications to launch the new organisation cost £67,000; replacement of 376 signs at 245 sites cost £40,000—£106 per sign—replacement livery costs for 37 vehicles was £20,000—£540 per vehicle.

EDUCATION

Sex Education

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when the consultative draft on guidelines to schools on the new arrangements for sex education will be issued; how long the consultation period will be for these guidelines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: Consultative draft guidance on the new arrangements for sex education in schools in England was published on 6 December 1993, inviting comments by 18 February 1994. The draft guidance places sex education in schools firmly within a moral framework. Copies have been placed in the Library. We intend to issue the guidance in final form to schools next spring.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Sproat: My Department does not have a "sensitive documents unit".

EMPLOYMENT

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In the 1992-93 financial year, the latest year for which annual costs are available, the Department spent £216,352 on ministerial cars. The Department has a call on four official vehicles for use by its Ministers.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91; and how many vehicles were involved.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In the 1990-91 financial year, the Department spent £171,198 on ministerial cars. At that time, the Department had a call on four official vehicles for use by its Ministers.

Access to Work Scheme

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the proposed budget for 1994-95 for the access to work scheme; and what were the 1993-94 budgets for the special aids to employment, personal reader service, fares to work, and adaptions of premises and equipment schemes.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Andrew Miller, dated 9 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about the Access To Work budget for 1994-95 and the 1993-94 budgets for the special aids to employment, personal reader service, fares to work, and adaptions of premises and equipment schemes.

The information you have asked for is as follows:

1994-95—Proposed budget (subject to final allocation):

Access to work=£12·6 million.

1993-94—Budgets:

Special aids to employment	6,837,000
Personal reader service	1,430,000
Fares to work	2,352,000
Adaptations to premises and equipment	465,000

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Employment Agencies

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what grounds are taken into account by him in refusing a grant for a licence for an employment agency.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The main grounds for refusing a licence under the Employment Agencies Act 1973 are the unsuitability of the applicant, or any person to be associated with the agency, because of misconduct or other sufficient reason. Factors taken into account when considering whether or not to grant a licence include information from an applicant's or an associated person's previous agency activity, employment history or references, convictions or adverse judgments involving fraud or other dishonesty and objections made by interested parties.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

The Attorney-General: There are no dedicated sensitive documents units in the Department for which I am responsible. The handling of sensitive documents forms part of the responsibilities of the departmental records officer for each of the Departments and they carry out their duties in accordance with the guidelines in chapter 9 of the open government White Paper.

Mr. Roger Levitt

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney-General when the Serious Fraud Office (1) first suggested to the counsel to Mr. Roger Levitt that he plead guilty to only some of the charges; and if he will list the charges concerned;

(2) what reasons underlay the decision of the Serious Fraud Office not to proceed with the theft charges against Roger Levitt;

(3) what was the estimated cost to public funds of the Roger Levitt case;

(4) what actions the Serious Fraud Office took in the Roger Levitt case which were subsequently described as wholly illegal by the trial judge;

(5) whether the Serious Fraud Office knew when it accepted the guilty plea by Roger Levitt that the judge would impose a non-custodial sentence.

The Attorney-General: In every complex fraud matter it is necessary to ensure that the counts in the indictment are the minimum reasonably necessary for the proper and effective presentation of the case. No counts of theft were in fact alleged in the indictment, although there were a number of counts other than fraudulent trading including counts of obtaining property by deception. An initial decision to proceed on a single count of fraudulent trading was taken in the light of general guidance given by the Court of Appeal and reviewed after the trial judge had given directions limiting the scope of the evidence. A subsequent application to re-join several substantive counts was refused.

No such suggestion of the nature referred to by my hon. Friend was made by or on behalf of the Serious Fraud Office. The offer by Roger Levitt to plead guilty to fraudulent trading on the basis upon which he in fact pleaded was first made on Monday 22 November 1993 by his leading counsel to leading counsel for the Crown.

The Serious Fraud Office was not aware that the judge would impose a non-custodial sentence when it informed the defence that the proposed plea of guilty by Roger Levitt was acceptable. Sentencing is a matter entirely for the judge. The prosecution can never change its mind about accepting a plea on the grounds that a sentence is too lenient.

The trial judge never described any action by the Serious Fraud Office as "wholly illegal" and never criticised the SFO in any way at all.

The best estimate of the cost of the Serious Fraud Office arising from this case as yet available is approximately £1·4 million. I have at present no information about other costs and will write to my hon. Friend.

TRANSPORT

Marine Safety

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the first report of the National Marine Safety Steering Committee was published; and what proposals he intends to bring forward to tighten safety regulations for powered recreational marine craft, and to control the use of jet skis in the vicinity of bathing beaches.

Mr. Norris: The first report of the National Marine Safety Steering Committee—NMSSC—was issued on 21 October 1993. The report includes a number of recommendations referred to the NMSSC from the district marine safety committees which relate to the regulation and safe operation of recreational craft generally. Those recommendations are now under consideration.

Satellites

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when a decision is to be announced on differential geostationary positioning satellites;

(2) when his Department expects to publish the feasibility report on monitoring the integrity of the United States Norstar global positioning satellite system;

(3) if he will list the representations he has had about differential geostationary positioning satellites;

(4) when non-encrypted differential geostationary positioning satellites will be available to the leisure market in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Norris: The global positioning system—GPS—is a method of determining position based upon signals from satellites. The system has been developed by the United States of America Department of Defence. It has not yet been declared fully operational. Encrypted differential global positioning system—DGPS—signals are transmitted from the United Kingdom and from the Republic of Ireland. Such signals can improve the accuracy of the position found. Those signals are provided on a commercial basis by Scorpio Marine, under the terms of a 1991 contract with the three general lighthouse authorities—GLAs. The Department recently received representations from Trinity house, on behalf of the GLAs, to consider the case for transmitting unencrypted signals. Officials from the Department are to meet the GLAs shortly to consider both that proposal and also a draft study by the GLAs on monitoring the integrity of GPS signals.

Electronic Charting

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce a recognised standard for electronic charting.

Mr. Norris: The standards for electronic chart data and information systems—ECDIS—will be announced when performance specifications are adopted by the International Maritime Organisation. We support this move and hope that the standards will be accepted by the IMO's maritime safety committee next May.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about electronic notices to mariners and electronic chart updating.

Mr. Norris: The International Maritime Organisation is developing performance standards for electronic chart display and information systems—ECDIS. It is anticipated that the standards will call for the promulgation of essential information by appropriate means including notices to mariners.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of the export potential for British technology in electronic charting; and what discussions he has had with the hydrographic department.

Mr. Norris: Although discussions have been held with the hydrographic department, particularly within the marine navigational equipment committee on the development of international standards for electronic charting, no estimate has been made of the export potential for the technology.

Thames Rescue Arrangements

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to reviewing his decision to reject the recommendations of the report of the Hayes inquiry into river safety—Cm 1991—that there should be an early review of the rescue arrangements and equipment on the Thames.

Mr. Norris: The Government gave careful consideration to this recommendation, which suggested an early review of the rescue arrangements and equipment on the Thames at the time that the report of the inquiry into river safety by John Hayes was published. It was concluded then that a further review of this kind would not be justified. Action has, however, been taken to ensure that appropriate lessons have been learned.

The Home Office has advised that replies from the main agencies involved in River Thames rescue operations confirmed that contingency planning has been adjusted in the light of lessons learned from the Marchioness-Bowbelle disaster.

In addition, a review of rescue arrangements and equipment on the River Thames between Teddington and the Thames barrier has been completed by the relevant district marine safety committee, and a new working group for the lower Thames was set up on 14 July 1993, with the initial task of assessing rescue arrangements on this lower section of the river. The district marine safety committee is also proposing to establish a sub-working group to consider life-saving appliances and escape from water up vertical walls on the banks of the Thames.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of the authenticated transcript of the radio-telephone conversation between the Port of London authority Thames navigation service and the vessels involved in the collision between the Marchioness and the Bowbelle on the night of 29 August 1989.

Mr. Norris: I am arranging for a transcript of the recording made in the early hours of 20 August 1989 to be placed in the Library. The recording was made by the Port of London authority, of communications on VHF channel 14 which were broadcast or received by the Thames navigation service at Woolwich.

Car Crash Tests

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy towards the use by (a) the Transport Research Laboratory or (b) any other transport research centres funded by his Department of human corpses in car crash tests.

Mr. Key: The Department has never carried out car crash tests using human corpses. Crash tests are a widely used techique to establish the safety of vehicle designs, but the United Kingdom always uses instrumented mannequins or dummies to measure the impact forces on the occupants. The Department is aware that tests using human corpses are carried out in a number of countries, but not in the United Kingdom. The information derived from them is available worldwide.

Rail Services (Cornwall)

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last discussed with the chairman of British Rail its plans for railway services in Cornwall.

Mr. Freeman: I discussed BR's proposals for services to Cornwall, among other things, with the chief executive of British Rail on 23 September. These are operational matters for BR and I have therefore asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member. However, I understand from British Rail that, from May 1994, it proposes to replace the 06.45 InterCity service from Penzance with a Regional Railways service to provide an 06.40 service from Penzance, connecting at Bristol with the InterCity service to Paddington. The May 1994 timetable will continue to include sleeper services. Discounted fares policy is, of course, a matter for British Rail, which has received representations on the applicability to the 05.19 service and is considering the matter.

Catalytic Converters

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has of the effect on morbidity of catalytic converters fitted to cars.

Mr. Sackville: I have been asked to reply.

We are not aware of any epidemiological evidence that catalytic converters fitted to motor cars or any other vehicles with internal combustion engines influence morbidity. The converters reduce the emissions of pollutant gases and particles, which would be expected to be beneficial, but emit very low levels of the catalytic metals. The level of metals emitted are likely to be so low as to have minimal, if any, effect on morbidity.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Norris: The Department's record service employs four staff to register and manage classified files. The total number of documents processed each year is not currently known, but the Department of Transport's file list is being computerised, which will enable analysis of files held.

Donaldson Inquiry

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date he expects the Donaldson inquiry to report its findings and recommendations.

Mr. Norris: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on 24 November, column 64.

Klondyker Ships

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the full marine accident investigation branch report into the Klondyker incidents in Shetland during October and November this year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: The accidents are being investigated, and the marine accident investigation branch has issued five interim recommendations addressed to Lerwick harbour trust and the Department of Transport. When the investigations are complete, a report will be produced, but it is too early to say when it will be available.

Borodinskoe Polye

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list, in respect of the Borodinskoe Polye the (a) salvage costs, (b) oil pollution recovery costs and (c) other costs incurred by his Department.

Mr. Norris: The salvage, oil recovery and counter pollution costs in respect of the Borodinskoe Polye are estimated to be in excess of £770,000 and other costs incurred are estimated at £12,000.

MV Braer

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date he expects to publish the marine accident investigation branch report into the sinking of the Braer.

Mr. Norris: It is hoped that the report will be published in January.

River Safety

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now reconsider the decisions made not to establish a public inquiry into the Marchioness disaster of comparable scope to those already conducted into the disasters at King's Cross and Clapham.

Mr. Norris: When the then Secretary of State considered the need for a public inquiry he concluded that the holding of a formal investigation was unnecessary given that a full, thorough and comprehensive inquiry had been carried out by the marine accident investigation branch—MAIB. Subsequently, the view has remained that a formal investigation would be unlikely to add to the inspector's findings, or to the 27 safety recommendations made in the MAIB report. The position was not changed by anything said in the Hayes report, which made no suggestion that a further inquiry into the accident was needed. I therefore remain of the view that the case for a formal inquiry has not been made.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has anything to add to his answer to the hon. Member for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) of 19 July, Official Report, column 78, concerning universal applications of all the recommendations of the Hayes report on river safety.

Mr. Norris: The Hayes report concerns river safety. The Department publishes an annual schedule, giving details of progress on each recommendation, copies of which are placed in the Library of the House. The next schedule is due to be published in July 1994. In the meantime, action continues on all of the 22 recommendations.

PRIME MINISTER

European Community Expenditure

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Prime Minister what was the level of EC expenditure in the United Kingdom disaggregated by parliamentary constituency and EC programme, in each year since 1988-89.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is not available. Details of public sector receipts by Government Department were published in table 11.4 of the 1993 Chancellor's departmental report. This table covers the outturn for the years 1987-88 to 1991-92, estimated outturn for 1992-93 and plans for 1993-94 to 1995-96. Departments' latest forecast of EC receipts will be published in the 1994 Chancellor's departmental report, early next year.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 9 December.

The Prime Minister: I am travelling to Brussels for the European Council meeting and other meetings.

Political Donations

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Prime Minister if he will introduce legislation to require all political parties to compile and publish annually comprehensive accounts showing the source of all donations and the extent of all expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so.

No. 10 Downing Street

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions he has used No. 10 Downing street premises for functions of the Conservative party; what is the cost to public funds; and what was the purpose of each occasion.

The Prime Minister: When charitable or other non-official events are held at No. 10 Downing street, the organisers are responsible for all catering and staff costs as well as other miscellaneous direct costs.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Prime Minister in what circumstances the premises of No. 10 Downing street are available for hire by outside organisations; and at what cost.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 30 November 1993, Official Report, column 420.

War Anniversaries

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister what plans the Government have with its wartime allies to mark (a) the 50th anniversary of the D-Day operation and (b) the 50th anniversary of the end of the war in Europe.

The Prime Minister: Plans for a series of events to mark the 50th anniversary of the D-Day landings, both in the United Kingdom and in France, are now well advanced. These plans have been made in close co-operation with other Governments. An announcement will be made shortly.

Plans for events to mark the end of the second world war are being considered at present. An announcement will be made next year.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Fireworks

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures his Department currently takes to ensure that fireworks manufactured abroad and imported into Britain meet British safety standards.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Health and Safety Executive —HSE—authorises the importation of fireworks only if they comply with British Standard 7114:1988 on firework safety. Also, local trading standards officers use BS7114 as a benchmark, in exercising their powers under the Consumer Protection Act 1987, to ensure that fireworks on sale to the public are safe.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the cost of firework accident advertising and the number of recorded accidents in 1993; and what was the comparable figure for each of the preceding 10 years.

Mr. McLoughlin: The costs of firework accident prevention work falling on the Department's safety awareness budget and the numbers of fireworks accidents requiring hospital treatment were as follows:

	£000	Accidents
1984	35	778
1985	40	968
1986	51	846
1987	78	960
1988	57	877
1989	64	800
1990	111	805
1991	74	723
1993	160	n/a

The firework accident figures cover accidents occurring in the three weeks preceding 5 November and in the week immediately following it. This is the period of availability of fireworks under the voluntary agreement on retail supply with the fireworks industry. The 1993 statistics will not be available until spring 1994.

Imported Coal

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he proposes to take to protect householders from the dangers of imported house coal.

Mr. McLoughlin: There is no reason to believe that imported coal is any more dangerous than that produced in the United Kingdom, although preparation is important. Information on quality standards and on the safe burning of solid fuel is available from the Domestic Coal Consumers Council and through the approved coal merchants scheme.

Post Office Users National Council

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the current members of POUNC for the south Yorkshire area; what were their qualifications; when their current term of office is due to expire; and when nominations to this organisation will next be advertised.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Post Office Act 1969, under which the Post Office Users National Council—POUNC—was set up, provides for the appointment of persons likely to be concerned with matters within the competence of the council. At the same time, it stipulates that regard should be given to the desirability of having members who are familiar with the special requirements and circumstances of particular parts of the British islands.

Within this framework, the interests of all users of post office services in the United Kingdom are represented on the council. There is no specific member for the south Yorkshire area. However, the interests of post office services users in the south Yorkshire area are also served by the appropriate non-statutory local post office advisory committees—POACs.

Several POUNC members' terms of appointment will expire at the end of 1994. In reviewing those appointments, consideration will be given to future representation in consultation, as appropriate.

Details of council membership, together with post office advisory committees are listed in POUNC annual reports, copies of which are sent to Members of Parliament on an individual basis.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the hon. Member for Don Valley may be sent a copy of the reply sent on 22 September on behalf of the Prime Minister, in answer to the letter handed to the Prime Minister on 15 June by a Japanese group in respect of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant.

Mr. Eggar: A copy has been sent to the hon. Member, and I have today also placed a copy in the Library of the House.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what consideration has been given to the possibility of contracts between British Nuclear Fuels plc and customers of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant being varied or annulled in his deliberations as to the start-up of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant.

Mr. Eggar: Details of reprocessing contracts are a matter for British Nuclear Fuels plc and its customers. For the Government's consideration of the possibility of changes being made to contracts, I refer the hon. Member to the statement of Government policy on reprocessing and operation of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield, paragraphs 62-68, which was made available as one of the public consultation documents on 4 August 1993. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements are made for him or officials from his Department to read signed contracts between British Nuclear Fuels plc and customers of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant.

Mr. Eggar: My Department is in regular contact with British Nuclear Fuels plc on a wide range of issues.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps the Government have taken to validate British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.'s estimate of costs of decommissioning the thermal oxide reprocessing plant.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 7 December 1993]: Estimates of decommissioning costs are a matter for British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Car Boot Sales

Mr. French: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information he has on the sale of counterfeit goods at car boot sales.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department has no statistics concerning the sale of counterfeit goods at car boot sales, although it has received considerable evidence about the damage caused by the trade in counterfeit goods at such markets. The Trade Marks Bill, which has just been introduced, will help to combat counterfeiting, including at car boot sales.

Mr. French: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received about dangerous electrical items being sold at car boot sales.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have received representations on a number of issues concerning car boot sales, including the safety of second-hand electrical goods.

We have considered carefully all the issues relating to car boot sales and have concluded that the existing powers of enforcement authorities to address these concerns are sufficient. The safety of second-hand electrical equipment sold in the course of business, whether at a car boot sale or otherwise, is adequately regulated by the Low Voltage Electrical Equipment (Safety) Regulations 1989.

Fraud

Mr. Cryer: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many people are engaged in his Department on combating fraud in financial institutions; and at what annual cost.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Responsibility for combating fraud in financial institutions is shared between a number of bodies. Within my Department, staff in the investigations division currently total 210. The division's direct costs in 1993-94 are £16 million, including the cost of private sector inspectors and investigators. The division carries out investigations under the Companies Acts and other legislation throughout the corporate sector, where there are grounds for suspicion of wrongdoing and it brings criminal proceedings in respect of a wide range of offences, mainly reported to it by the Insolvency Service or brought to light by its own investigations. It also takes other action to protect the public, including action to disqualify directors and to wind up companies. Cases involving fraud in financial institutions constitute only a small part of the work of investigations division and no statistics are maintained which would separately identify resources devoted to this work.

Telecommunications

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will place in the Library a copy of the detailed explanation given by the Director General of Telecommunications for the K value of telecommunications services.

Mr. McLoughlin: The latest relevant statement by the Director General of Telecommunications, entitled "Future Controls on British Telecom's Prices", was published in June 1992. A copy of this has been placed in the Library of the House.

Satellite Launch Facility

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the initiative announced by AEA Technology to develop a satellite launch facility at the Dounreay nuclear establishment in Caithness.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for the Atomic Energy Authority.

Regional Development Organisations

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total budget allocated by his Department to regional organisations in 1992-93 in (i) the northern region and (ii) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Sainsbury: My Department's Invest in Britain Bureau paid £1,410,000 in grant in aid to the Northern Development Company for inward investment purposes in the financial year 1992-93 from a total budget of £5 million for the five regional development organisations in England.

Local Enterprise Agencies

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total amount spent by his Department on local enterprise agencies in 1992-93 in (a) the northern region and (b) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. McLoughlin: The total amount of DTI funding to local enterprise agencies in (a) the northern region and (b) the United Kingdom is not available.

Lloyd's

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations he has received as to the solvency of Lloyd's of London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: A proportion of the letters that I receive from right hon. and hon. Members and from members of the public about Lloyd's touches on questions of solvency. The statement and certificates demonstrating Lloyd's solvency for the year ended December 1992, which are required by part IV of the Insurance Companies Act 1982, were received by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade at the end of August 1993. My Department monitors the solvency of Lloyd's closely, as it does for insurance companies to which the 1982 Act relates.

Small Firms

Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the future of consultancy support for small firms provided by his Department.

Mr. Heseltine: Consultancy support for small and medium-sized businesses will continue beyond the life of the present enterprise initiative consultancy scheme in the form of a flexible consultancy and diagnostic service.

As I announced in the House on Tuesday, Official Report, columns 145-55, I shall publish a prospectus and guidelines for this service in January, inviting training and enterprise councils to submit proposals on behalf of business link partnerships to deliver the new service on a pilot basis in 1994-95. I expect the service to become nationally available from 1995-96, as the business link network is completed.

This new service will provide businesses with high-quality support, available locally and tailored to their individual needs. It will build and improve on the existing and highly successful enterprise initiative consultancy scheme.

In addition, I intend to trial a new consultancy brokerage service from January 1994, for introduction nationwide later in the year. This will open up to all businesses the considerable wealth of data and project management experience which has been accumulated on UK business consultants for the EI consultancy scheme.

These new services will be developed and introduced alongside the present scheme to ensure a smooth transition from the old to the new.

I have decided therefore that the present EI consultancy scheme will no longer close on 31 March 1994. It will instead remain open until we have received another 10,000 applications. This means we shall be supporting 10,000 projects beyond the previously announced closure date.

At current rates of demand that should enable us to continue accepting applications until well into next year, by which time new arrangements for consultancy support through business links will be in place.

Supervisory Bodies

Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the outcome of his review of the monitoring procedures of the recognised supervisory bodies.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: When the supervisory bodies for company auditors were granted recognition under the Companies Act 1989, it was agreed with them that they would review jointly with my Department this year the operation of their procedures for monitoring compliance by their members with their rules.

I have, therefore, asked the bodies to report to me on how their monitoring regimes have been operating, and to propose changes for the future.

I have also asked Professor Peter Moizer, Professor of Accounting at the university of Leeds, to provide me with an independent assessment of the state of monitoring.

I intend to publish the conclusions of the review early next year.

Plutonium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what requirements his Department places upon Nuclear Electric to provide data on the isotopic composition of plutonium produced in its nuclear plants.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 3 December 1993]: For the purpose of compiling the annual plutonium figures published by my Department, Nuclear Electric plc provides, for each of its sites, in respect of reactor discharges and dispatches from site, estimated percentages of fissile plutonium. In addition, the company supplies information to Euratom on the isotopic composition of plutonium in spent fuel shipped from each of its sites. This information is supplied via my Department.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what definitions his Department uses to describe different qualities of plutonium arising from civil nuclear reactors.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 3 December 1993]: As in the annual plutonium figures published by my Department, the quality of plutonium is normally described by reference to its fissile content. The estimated percentage of fissile plutonium is the sum of the masses of the plutonium 239 and 241 isotopes expressed as as percentage of the sum of the masses of all plutonium isotopes.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information his Department is provided by (a) Nuclear Electric, (b) British Nuclear Fuels plc and (c) the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority on the amounts of plutonium produced in each of their respective reactors.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 6 December 1993]: For the information supplied by Nuclear Electric plc, British Nuclear Fuels plc, BNFL, and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, UKAEA, to meet the requirements of Euratom safeguards regulation 3227/76, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 9 June 1993, Official Report, column 251. For the purpose of compiling the annual plutonium figures published by my Department, Nuclear Electric plc provides figures for plutonium production and reactor discharges for each of its stations.

Patent Office

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to make an announcement on the future of the Patent Office; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 7 December 1993]: The current review of the role of the Patent Office is expected to be completed by the end of the year. I hope to announce our conclusions following that review shortly thereafter.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will make a further statement on the progress towards establishing a RECHAR 2 programme from January 1994;

(2) what recent discussions he has held with the European Commission about (a) the objective 2 programme and (b) the RECHAR programme under the European regional development fund programme from January 1994.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 8 December 1993]: I saw the responsible Commissioner on 30 November about the Government's proposals for objective 2.

On RECHAR, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on 2 December, Official Report, column 736.

Accounts Services Agency

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to privatise the Accounts Services Agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 8 December 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire North (Mr. Heald) on 29 October, Official Report, column 805. The review of the Accounts Services Agency has yet to be concluded. In due course, a decision will be taken and an announcement made.

SCOTLAND

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Lang: My Department does not have such a unit. Documents are regularly reviewed by branches in accordance with centrally agreed procedures.

Crime Victims

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration is being given to measures to reduce the stressfulness for victims of crime of attendance at court; and if he will a make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The stress of appearing as a witness is partly caused by a fear of the unknown. The new measures being taken to provide information to victims and to make them familiar with the court and its procedures can help to allay such fears. The physical surroundings are also important and steps are taken, where possible, to separate Crown witnesses from accused persons and defence witnesses. Court staff make regular visits to witness rooms to provide progress reports, and will take appropriate action if a victim complains about intimidation or other pressure.

Where children are the victims of crime, a number of courts have facilities to take evidence by live television link, so that, if the court so orders, they do not have to confront the accused face to face. The use of screens to provide a barrier between a victim and an accused is also currently being evaluated.

Although there are certain rules of evidence designed to protect witnesses from particular types of questioning, going to court is inevitably stressful for many victims of crime. Two recently published reports, on the review of criminal evidence and on court programming, contain a number of recommendations which, if implemented, are likely to lead to a reduction in that stress and in the number of times victims have to attend court. Any new procedures must also, however, be fair to accused persons and so any proposals require careful consideration.

Volunteers from the Scottish Association of Victim Support Schemes aim to accompany as many victims to court as possible. The association provides some training to volunteers to assist them in helping victims through the court process. In 1993-94 SAVSS will receive a grant of £764,000 from the Scottish Office, of which £546,351 goes to fund local victim support schemes.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration is being given to improving the availability to victims of crime of information on the operation of the courts and the prosecution system; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A number of initiatives are being made in the spirit of the justice charter for Scotland. Procurators fiscal are making efforts to provide more information, and improved leaflets are now sent to all witnesses before coming to court. More information about the progress of cases is being given to witnesses waiting at court to give their evidence, and special arrangements, including pre-trial visits to the courtroom, exist for giving information to vulnerable witnesses. The very successful illustrated leaflet for children is also being updated. In one particular initiative the procurator fiscal provides information through local victim support schemes, and receives in return information about any special difficulties which victims may have. The Scottish Association of Victim Support Schemes has made an approach seeking funding support to produce a new information leaflet for victims of sexual offences. This is intended to provide relevant information and to inform them about aspects of the prosecution system and operation of the courts.

Football Stadia

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will bring forward legislation to ensure that all Scottish stadia are all-seater by August 1994.

Sir Hector Monro: I have no immediate plans to do so. We are satisfied from our regular contacts with the football authorities, through the Scottish Stadia Committee, that the voluntary undertaking given to Ministers in 1990 by the authorities remains at present the most appropriate basis for Government to secure acceptable safety standards at football grounds. That position is, however, kept closely under review.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the closure of facilities in Ayrshire Central and Ravenspark hospitals by the Community Health Care NHS trust since its establishment in April; and what changes in service provision have been made.

Mr. Stewart: The trust has closed three pavilions at Ravenspark hospital since patient referrals have diminished following the contract with Ayrshire and Arran health board. In addition, the trust has transferred the geriatric assessment facility from Ravenspark to Ayrshire Central. The contracts which Ayrshire and Arran health board has with the trust do not require the trust to provide the same number of beds as previously existed.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the closure of facilities in Crosshouse hospital by the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust since its establishment in April; and what reasons have been given for reductions in services.

Mr. Stewart: There has been no reduction in services. More patients have been treated in the first six months of the trust's existence compared with the same period last year and the trust is to be congratulated on its achievements. This increased activity has been achieved by changes in service delivery patterns which make better use of the facilities. Some wards are no longer required and have been closed but without any reduction in the service.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the refurbishment of the foyer of Crosshouse hospital by the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust; how much the refurbishment is costing; from where the funding for this refurbishment is being made available; and what similar work was carried out in Crosshouse hospital prior to the North Ayrshire and Arran trust being established this year.

Mr. Stewart: The main entrance of Crosshouse hospital has been refurbished with the creation of enhanced shop and tea bar facilities and the provision of new facilities for admissions, the patient welcoming service, a mother and baby room and toilets for disabled persons. The total cost is £150,000 of which £75,000 has been provided by the trust and the balance donated by the WRVS. The entrance has not been upgraded since the hospital opened in 1982.

Timber

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the United Kingdom's timber requirement is grown in the United Kingdom.

Sir Hector Monro: About 14 per cent.

Sheep Quota

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to make a statement on the arrangements for allocation of sheep quota from the national reserve.

Sir Hector Monro: The arrangements of applying to the national reserve of sheep quota were announced by the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department on Tuesday 7 December. Application forms are now available from the Department's area offices for producers in the first two categories of those eligible for an allocation from the reserve. This will not affect the position of producers in the other categories, arrangements for whom will be announced later.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to expedite the administrative procedures for allocation of sheep quota from the national reserve when the necessary orders are laid.

Sir Hector Monro: The Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department has invited producers falling within the first two categories of the seven categories of eligible producer to submit their applications now. This will enable the Department to speed up the processing of applications and permit allocations to be made as quickly as possible without affecting the position of producers in the other categories.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he gives to sheep producers awaiting allocations of quota from the national reserve about the short-term financial problems they face as a result of the delayed allocation of quota.

Sir Hector Monro: I advise them that the legislation relating to the national reserve has been laid and certain producers can therefore now apply for an allocation of quota from the reserve; that payment of the advance of sheep annual premium to these producers will be made as soon as possible after quota has been allocated from the reserve; and that this is expected to take place in about two months' time.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set up a tribunal with powers to award sheep quota allocations to hear cases of genuine hardship for sheep producers denied allocation of quota from the national reserve.

Sir Hector Monro: The legislation governing the allocation of quota from the national reserve sets out precisely the definition of the categories of producer eligible to apply to the reserve. There is no scope for making discretionary allocations to producers falling outwith those categories. I therefore have no plans to set up a tribunal.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many recorded phone messages his Department has received from sheep producers seeking information about allocation of quota from the national reserve.

Sir Hector Monro: The Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department has received several hundred telephone calls from producers on a variety of subjects relating to sheep quotas. It is not possible to identify separately the number concerned specifically with allocations from the national reserve or recorded messages from other telephone calls.

Court Service

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the future of the Scottish court service.

Mr. Lang: After consultation with the senior judiciary, I have decided that the Scottish court service, part of the Scottish courts administration, should be considered as a candidate for executive agency status, under the next steps initiative.

Castlehill Primary School

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he received an application for the opting out of Castlehill primary school in Ayr; from whom the application was received; what representations he has received for and against such a proposal; what is his estimate of the costs involved if the school is allowed to proceed with opting out; what consideration he has given to the request; and when he expects to make an announcement on his decision in this matter.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 8 December 1993]: The application for self-governing status for Castlehill primary school was submitted by the school board in June 1993. Three representations were received in support of the application and one representation was received opposing the application. As regards costs, it is premature to make any estimate. The results of the consideration currently being given to the application by my right hon. Friend will be announced shortly.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what ethnic monitoring he carries out of the Scottish Office work force; how many black and ethnic minority personnel are employed; and at what levels.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 3 December 1993]: Following earlier surveys of the ethnic origins of staff, all new entrants are invited to complete a questionnaire. We have achieved a 92 per cent. response rate. As at 1 October 1993, 34 staff have described themselves as belonging to an ethnic minority. These staff are employed in grades ranging from messenger to grade 6.

Child Patients

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the percentage of children in hospital admitted to adult wards.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: It is estimated that 2·5 per cent. of children in hospital in Scotland are admitted to adult wards, where there is no separate accommodation for children.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in 1991-92 a children's intensive care unit has refused admission to a critically ill child; and for what reasons.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: This information is not held centrally.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what number and percentage of children receiving intensive care were cared for in (a) children's wards, (b) adult intensive care units and (c) children's intensive care units.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The number of children receiving intensive care in children's wards is not available centrally.

The number of children aged zero to 14 years receiving care in adult intensive care units in general hospitals in 1992 was 138 or 21·5 per cent. of all children in the age group receiving care in an intensive care unit.

Intensive care units provided specially for children are not identifiable centrally except in children's hospitals. The number of children receiving care in intensive care units in children's hospitals in 1992 was 503, or 78·5 per cent. of all children in the age group receiving care in an intensive care unit.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the shortfall of paediatric intensive care unit beds.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Intensive care units provided specially for children are not identifiable centrally, except where they are provided in designated children's hospitals.

Forestry

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he proposes to take to ensure no loss of public access following disposal of any land owned by the Forestry Commission.

Sir Hector Monro: Arrangements were introduced in October 1991 for securing continued public access to woodlands sold by the Forestry Commission by means of prior agreements entered into between the commission and local authorities. These arrangements are currently being reviewed to see if any changes are needed.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what statutory conservation measures apply to private forestry land previously belonging to the Forestry Commission.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 8 December 1993]: There are several statutory conservation measures which apply to privately owned forestry land, whether or not it previously belonged to the Forestry Commission. These include the designation of woodlands as sites of special scientific interest and special protection areas. Private woodlands are also protected by the felling licensing regulations.

DEFENCE

British Nuclear Fuels

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the value of contracts placed by his Department with British Nuclear Fuels in each year since 1989.

Mr. Aitken: For security reasons it is not our practice to disclose the value of contracts placed with British Nuclear Fuels.

Atomic Energy (US-UK Agreement)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what variation has been made to article 2 of the amendment of 5 December 1979—Cmd 7976—to the United States-United Kingdom agreement on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes of 1958—Cmd 4119.

Mr. Aitken: None.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Ministers in his Department who since June 1987 have visited (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malaysia, (c) Singapore and (d) South Africa on official business; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

Mr. Aitken: Official visits by Ministers to the countries listed have been as follows:

Saudi Arabia

Minister (Armed Forces)—1990
Minister (Defence Procurement)—1988, 1993—twice

Minister (Defence Procurement)—1991
Under-Secretary of State—1992, 1993
Under-Secretary of State (Armed Forces)—1991

Minister (Armed Forces)—1988
Under-Secretary of State (Defence Procurement)—1987, 1989, 1990
South Africa
None.

All of these visits were for official purposes. My Department is unaware of any party political activities on these visits.

Toxic Chemicals

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations have been made to his Department by SubSea Offshore Ltd. and AEA Technology Ltd. concerning the location, identification, monitoring and recovery of toxic chemicals.

Mr. Aitken: SubSea Offshore Ltd. and AEA Technology Ltd. have had exploratory discussions with the chemical and biological defence establishment, Porton Down.

Greenham Common

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for the deregulation of Greenham Common in order to offer it for sale to the private market.

Mr. Hanley: Newbury district council has recently published a draft planning brief in respect of Greenham Common that provides inter alia for public open space on the "green areas" including the runway.

The district council has stated in the draft that it would not object to an application by MOD to remove the former Greenham Common from the county register and officials have been instructed to proceed with the application for deregistration so that the land can be made available for public open space.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much income his Department received from the letting of Greenham Common for each month between January and November 1993.

Mr. Hanley: The income generated by short-term lettings at Greenham Common is a matter between the MOD and the parties concerned and as such must be treated as commercial in confidence.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department paid for the maintenance and security at Greenham Common for each month between January and November 1993.

Mr. Hanley: It is not possible to provide the information in the form requested but the total cost of maintenance and security from 1 January to 30 November 1993 was of the order of £1,000,000, the large majority of which is accounted for by the salaries and deployment costs of the Ministry of Defence Police presence on the site.

Helicopters

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many helicopter flying hours are allocated per month in Northern Ireland; at what stage in the month, on average, this allocated is used up; and what are the arrangements when demand exceeds the official allocation of helicopter flying hours.

Mr. Hanley: It is not the practice to provide detailed operational information about such matters as the allocation of helicopters flying hours. Allocation of helicopter flying hours for all operations, including Northern Ireland, is made centrally by the MOD on an annual basis commensurate with the requirements of individual theatres. Within individual theatres, arrangements are made to match the allocation with operational needs. If demands arise which cannot be met from within allocated hours, additional hours may be requested by the theatre concerned.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many troop-carrying helicopters were permanently assigned to each helicopter-equipped RAF air transport squadron on (a) 1 January, (b) 1 April and (c) 1 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The numbers of aircraft are as follows:

Squadron	1 January 1993	1 April 1993	1 July 1993
7 Squadron[1]	15 Chinook	15 Chinook	12 Chinook
18 Squadron[1]	5 Chinook 5 Puma	4 Chinook 5 Puma	5 Chinook 5 Puma
28 Squadron	8 Wessex	8 Wessex	8 Wessex
33 Squadron	12 Puma	12 Puma	12 Puma
60 Squadron	9 Wessex	9 Wessex	9 Wessex
72 Squadron	15 Wessex	15 Wessex	15 Wessex
230 Squadron	15 Puma	15 Puma	15 Puma
The Queen's Flight	2 Wessex	2 Wessex	2 Wessex

[1] The RAF Chinook force has been undergoing a mid-life update and therefore the numbers vary against 7 and 18 Squadrons.

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many anti-tank helicopters are premanently assigned to each Army air corps regiment.

Mr. Hanley: Lynx helicopters, equipped with TOW missiles, in the anti-tank role are established with the Army Air Corps as follows:

	Number of Aircraft
1 (United Kingdom) Armoured Division
1 Regiment	18
3 (United Kingdom) Division
9 Regiment	18
24 Airmobile Brigade
3 Regiment	12
4 Regiment	12

In addition, the Army Corps Centre at Middle Wallop holds 14 helicopters, and 3 Commando Brigade has six helicopters which are operated by the Royal Marines.

Departmental Land

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much land, by acreage, his Department owns in each of the counties of Wales, and in each of the regions of Scotland.

Mr. Hanley: The land owned in areas by the Ministry of Defence in each of the counties of Wales and in each of the regions of Scotland is set out in the table.

Figures are at 1 April 1993—the latest date for which records are available—and relate to freehold landholdings, including foreshore, for which deeds were held. Acquisitions or disposals which may have been completed but where deeds had not been transferred by 1 April 1993 are not included.

Boxing

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what part boxing plays in training and physical education in the armed services.

Mr. Hanley: In the Royal Navy, including Royal Marines, and Royal Air Force, boxing is an entirely voluntary sporting activity, playing no part in training or formal physical education.

In the Army, the initial phase of new entry recruit training includes—for male recruits only—six periods of instruction in basic boxing skills. The regimental physical training instructor class 2 course, held at the Army school of physical training, includes a 22-period Army unit coach award course to qualify instructors to teach the basic skills covered in the six periods of new entry training.

In all three services, boxing is available as a sporting activity on a voluntary basis. Each service has a Boxing Association, which is affiliated to the Amateur Boxing Association Ltd.; all organised boxing sporting activities are conducted in accordance with that national governing body's regulations, including its medical rules.

Budgets

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are (a) the current budgets and (b) the previous budgets of all the higher level budget holders with the exception of GOC Northern Ireland, DG General Intelligence (Eurasia), DG Management and Support of Intelligence, DG of Strategic and Technical Intelligence and DG Intelligence (Rest of World); and if he will list the planned budgets for all the same budget holders for (i) 1993-94, (ii) 1994-95 and (iii) 1995-96.

Mr. Hanley: The budgets for higher level budget holders are now published annually in Defence Statistics, available in the Library of the House. The budgets for financial year 1992-93 are shown in table 1.3A on page 10 of Defence Statistics, 1992 edition, and the budgets for 1993-94 in table 1.3 on page 9 of the UK Defence Statistics, 1993 edition. We do not publish details of planned budgets as approval to commit expenditure is subject to formal endorsement through Ministers and the parliamentary supply system.

Army Costs

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the annual running cost of (a) an armoured regiment, (b) an infantry battalion and (c) an artillery field regiment stationed in the United Kingdom; and what changes have occurred in this figure since 1989-90;

(2) what is the annual running cost of (a) an armoured regiment, (b) an infantry battalion and (c) an artillery field regiment stationed with the British Army of the Rhine; and what changes have occurred in this figure since 1989-90.

Mr. Hanley: Since 1991, when new management strategy was introduced, the basis for costing Army units has changed. In addition, the current methodology does not distinguish between UK and Germany-based units, and cannot be compared with figures for 1989-90. Estimates for this financial year, at current prices, are as follows:

(£ million)

Unit	Costs
Armoured regiments	23
Infantry battalion (Armoured)	23
Artillery field Regiment (AS90)	22

These figures include manpower, fuel, ammunition, training and spares costs.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current annual cost of (a) a regular Army soldier, (b) a Territorial Army soldier, (c) a Royal Navy sailor, (d) a Royal Naval Reserve sailor, (e) a Royal Naval Auxiliary Service sailor, (f) a Royal Air Force airman or woman, and (g) a Royal Auxiliary Air Force airman or woman.

Mr. Hanley: The information which can be provided without disproportionate cost is shown in the table. The figures are an average cost per person, taken for all ranks, commissioned and non-commissioned, in 1992-93. The figures for the regulars include pay, earnings-related national insurance contribution, allowances and superannuation. The figures for the Reserves include allowances and, except for the Royal Naval Auxiliary Reserve, pay, ERNIC and training bounties.

No account has been taken of any other costs—for example, equipment development, production and maintenance, fuel, ammunition, accommodation and utilities, food or transport.

1992-93 average pay bill cost of service personnel[1]

Maintenance Backlog

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total maintenance backlog of (a) unavoidable and essential repairs and (b) urgent repairs on the defence estate at 1 April in each year since 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: Since the untying from the Property Services Agency on 1 April 1990, the information requested has been held by 23 separate top-level budget holders within the Ministry of Defence. It would, therefore, involve disproportionate cost to acquire the information.

Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what British contribution is made to the reaction force planning staff at Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers in Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The United Kingdom contributes six officers and two other ranks to the Allied Command Europe Reaction Force Planning Staff—ARFPS—whose total strength is 48 officers and 13 other ranks.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made for funding the new NATO rapid reaction force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The nations assigning forces to the Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps—ARRC—will meet the costs of their national contingencies. The costs of the headquarters will be shared between the participating nations and NATO on terms presently under negotiation.

Belize

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current annual running cost of (a) the Army detachment and (b) the RAF detachment stationed in Belize; and what changes have occurred in these figures since 1989-90.

Mr. Hanley: It is not possible to attribute the total costs of the Belize garrison to the Army element or to the RAF element except for manpower costs. A significant cost element is for services common to both detachments and covers areas such as the garrison headquarters, works services, utilities and locally employed civilians. The costs of the garrison for the 1991-92, 1992-93 and an estimate for 1993-94, split into directly identifiable Army and RAF costs and common costs, are given. Comparable data for 1989-90 are not available.

Army manpower	21	18	24
RAF manpower	5	6	5
Common costs	12	10	10
Total	38	34	39

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the issue of compensation for nuclear test veterans.

Mr. Hanley: Compensation would be sympathetically considered for any British nuclear test veteran who could be shown to have suffered injury or illness as a result of radiation from the nuclear tests. No such case has yet been found. The report of the National Radiological Protection Board—NRPB—published in 1988 found no overall excess of death or malignant disease among test veterans: this position is confirmed in the NRPB follow-up study to be published this week. A copy will be placed in the Library.

Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the follow-up report by the National Radiological Protection Board being published in the British Medical Journal on mortality and cancer among nuclear test veterans.

Mr. Hanley: The joint National Radiological Protection Board/Imperial Cancer Research Fund—NRPB/ICRF—study into Mortality and Cancer incidence among nuclear test participants, commissioned by the Ministry of Defence, will be published on Saturday 11 December in the British Medical Journal after having successfully completed independent peer review. There will also be an accompanying NRPB report.

The NRPB is an independent statutory body which was set up to give advice on radiation protection. The ICRF is a charitable organisation which plays a leading role in cancer research. The authors of the report include eminent scientists who have published widely in the field, among whom is the distinguished epidemiologist Professor Sir Richard Doll, OBE, MD, DSc, FRS, FRCP, Emeritus Professor of Medicine at the university of Oxford, who is well known for his work on smoking-related disease.

The Ministry of Defence accepts the findings of this independent report. The study concludes that participation in the nuclear weapon test programme has had no detectable effect on participants' expectation of life, or on their risk of developing cancer or other fatal diseases.

A report published by the NRPB in 1988 dealt with mortality and cancer up to 31 December 1983 among former test participants, compared with a control group of service and civilian personnel matched for age, sex and rank who served in tropical areas at the time of the tests but were not, themselves, participants in the atmospheric nuclear weapon test programme. This study found no overall excess of death, or of cancer, among former participants compared with national rates. Out of over 20,000 former test participants, about 1,600 had died, including 400 from cancer—no more than among the matched control group or the general population. Of these 400, 22 had died of leukaemia and six from multiple myeloma, figures higher than the control group but similar to those expected from national rates. The authors considered that one possibility was that these elevated levels simply reflected an unusually low incidence of myeloma and leukaemia among the control group.

The follow-up report to be published in the British Medical Journal includes cancer and mortality data to 31 December 1990. During the seven years between the end of 1983 and the end of 1990, about 1,200 further deaths occurred among former test participants, 370 of them from cancer. Again, these figures were no higher than among either the general population or the matched control group. Of the 370 further cancer deaths among participants, three were from multiple myeloma and six from leukaemia. The three deaths from myeloma were fewer than among the general population and the control group. Taken together with the figures from the previous study, for all deaths up to 31 December 1990 there was no increased incidence of multiple myeloma among participants compared with either the general population or controls.

The six deaths from leukaemia among participants between 1 January 1984 and 31 December 1990 were fewer than expected from national rates and fewer in veterans than among the controls. Furthermore, the total number of deaths for the entire period of both studies up to the end of 1990 from leukaemia was exactly the same as expected nationally. The excess of leukaemia in test participants compared with the control group found in the previous study is therefore likely to be a chance finding, although the report states that the possibility that test participation may have caused a small risk of developing leukaemia in the early years after the tests, cannot be completely ruled out. The study however, finds the evidence for a causal link to be weak for several reasons.

First, the highest increase amongst participants was not among men in groups whose duties gave them the potential for exposure to ionising radiation, nor among men employed by the atomic weapons research establishment or directly involved in the minor trials at Maralinga in whom undocumented inhalation or ingestion, if any, was most likely to have occurred. Secondly, the recorded doses of external radiation were very small and, on the best evidence now available, would have been estimated to cause not even one extra induced case of leukaemia. Thirdly, there was no evidence of an increasing risk with increasing dose as would be expected if caused by exposure to ionising radiation.

The Ministry of Defence has also compiled for the NRPB an environmental monitoring report for Christmas island. A copy has been placed in the Library. This report shows that measurements of radioactive fallout taken at the time of the tests were usually below the limit of detection. On the few occasions when radioactivity was detectable the levels were low, decayed or dispersed rapidly, and did not constitute a hazard or danger to test participants, visitors or inhabitants of the island. The dates when elevated levels were found were not associated with the detonation date of any particular United Kingdom device, but corresponded to the worldwide fallout pattern of the time. Such global fallout is part of background radiation to which we are all exposed.

I can also announce today that I have, in line with the Government's commitment to open government, and the Ministry of Defence's wish to open to public scrutiny any documents relating to the safety of test participants, declassified the yields of Christmas island tests. The figures are contained in the environmental monitoring report for Christmas island to which I have just referred. The corresponding figures for the Australian atmospheric nuclear weapon tests were declassified in 1985. The yield figures can be used to calculate doses from information readily available in the open literature. These calculations confirm the assertion that doses were vanishingly low at all points where participants were mustered at the instant of detonation.

I believe that this new NRPB/ICRF study confirms that there is no evidence to suggest that any cancer or other fatal disease was caused by exposure to ionising radiation from the tests.

A copy of the British Medical Journal article and associated report will be placed in the Library of the House.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of the total dwelling stock in each local authority area in England is (a) unfit for habitation and (b) in need of major renovation.

Sir George Young: Local authorities are requested to provide information in their annual housing investment programme—HIP1—returns on all dwellings in their area which are unfit, and on those not unfit but in need of renovation. However, there are doubts about the quality of the data provided by some authorities.

These doubts arise because of the substantial variations between neighbouring authorities in the proportions of dwellings reported as unfit or in need of repair, and also because of implausible changes between years in some of the reported figures.

The data reported by local authorities in England on total dwelling stock—column A15—and the numbers of dwellings reported as unfit—column A35—and not unfit but in need of renovation—column A45—from which the percentages requested can be calculated are in the 1993 "HIP1 All Items Print". A copy is available in the Library.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how his Department will be represented at the Salford inquiry on housing in the north-west to be held on 12 January 1994.

Sir George Young: Officials from the Department's north-west regional office will attend.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Gummer: In the financial year 1992-93, the Department spent £2,660,198·30 on press advertising and £2,799,915·14 on television advertising. These costs include creative and production charges, value added tax, and other levies as paid.

The main campaigns were:

Helping the Earth begins at Home.
Right to Buy.
Council Tax Press Advertising March 1993.
Making a Corporate Commitment—to Energy Saving.
Halon Banking.
EMAS—Energy Management Assistance Scheme.

There was no expenditure on radio advertising in that financial year.

A breakdown of publicity expenditure is not available for the years 1985 and 1979.

Biodiversity

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish the biodiversity action plan compiled in response to the biodiversity convention signed at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development.

Mr. Yeo: Work on the production of the biodiversity action plan is in its final stages, and publication will be after the House returns, in January.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on how Britain's impact on biodiversity in other countries will be addressed in the United Kingdom's follow-up to agreements made at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development.

Mr. Yeo: Britain's impact on biodiversity in other countries will be addressed in the biodiversity action plan and the sustainable development strategy as appropriate, both of which are due to be published after the House returns, in January.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements have been made for the ratification before the end of 1993 of the biological diversity convention by the United Kingdom.

Mr. Yeo: The convention on biological diversity was laid before Parliament in January of this year. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 2 December 1993, Official Report, column 654.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Mr. Gummer: A large number of staff in the Department handle documents which may be regarded as sensitive. There is no special unit; all staff are required to handle sensitive documents according to standard rules.

Community Care

Mr. Nick Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the representations he has received concerning his proposals to reinstate certification 10 of the Housing Corporation's special needs procedure guide and the consequent withdrawal of revenue funding where a social services authority sponsors an individual under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend and I have received representations from the organisations listed below, or from hon. Members writing on their behalf, in connection with the application of the Housing Corporation's revenue funding rules beyond the current financial year. A further five hon. Members have written to us about the general issue.

Turning Point

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when current planning permission for the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield expires.

Mr. Curry: The planning permission, which is contained in SI 1978 No. 523, did not specify a final date by which the buildings must be completed and the plant brought into use.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what safeguards he has instituted in the local government review process to ensure that the trading standards departments are not adversely affected in the reorganisation process.

Mr. Baldry: The Local Government Commission's recommendations must enable adequate provision to be made for all existing local government functions, including the trading standards service. This is a matter we shall be looking at as we receive the commission's final reports for each area.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received about trading standards departments in relation to the local government review.

Mr. Baldry: This year, my right hon. Friend has received 24 representations on the general issue of trading standards in relation to the local government review.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements have been made to ensure the continued existence and development of a network of county record offices after the reform of local government authorities.

Mr. Baldry: The Local Government Commission's recommendations must enable adequate provision to be made for all existing local government functions, including the provision of archive services. This is a matter we shall be looking at as we receive the commission's final reports for each area.

Council House Sales

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what statutory provisions govern the requirement on borough councils to devote receipts from sale of dwellings to their tenants solely to redeem accumulated debt.

Sir George Young: Section 59 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 requires local authorities to set aside as provision for credit liabilities 75 per cent. of their receipts from the disposal of dwellings and 50 per cent. of other receipts; the remainder may be spent. Those percentages are varied for certain receipts by the Local Authorities (Capital Finance) Regulations 1990, as amended, and in particular are reduced to nil for virtually all receipts obtained between 13 November 1992 and 31 December 1993.

Section 64 of the 1989 Act provides that amounts set aside may be used to repay borrowing or discharge credit liabilities; they may also be used for capital expenditure on the strength of a credit approval. The regulations give authorities without long-term debt greater freedom to spend these amounts.

Grants (Day Visitors)

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, in the local government finance statement for 1994-95, how much extra grant Stockport metropolitan borough council will get as a result of the inclusion of day visitors in the formula; and how much of that extra will relate to visitors to Lyme park.

Mr. Baldry: Stockport metropolitan borough council would receive £0·264 million as a result of the inclusion of an allowance for day visitors to the authority within the proposed calculation of standard spending assessments for 1994-95. It is not possible to say how much of that amount is attributable to day visitors to specific attractions. Lyme park, however, is not within the Stockport metropolitan district and, therefore, visitors to the park would not be included in Stockport's figures.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what account is taken of sites outside a borough but maintained by the authority in calculating grants for day visitors.

Mr. Baldry: The allowance within standard spending assessments for day visitors is designed to reflect the impact on services provided by local authorities of visitors to their area.

The services likely to be affected include street cleaning, refuse collection and environmental health.

It is not the intention that the allowance should compensate authorities directly for the cost of any recreational facilities which they choose to provide in the areas of other authorities.

Bolton Council

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will reply to Bolton council's request, dated 15 November, for ministerial consent to the sale of 24 shops with living accommodation over.

Mr. Baldry: The consent was issued on 6 December.

European Environment Agency

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking following the decision to locate the European Environment Agency in Denmark; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: The decision to site the European Environment Agency in Denmark was taken on 29 October. The regulation establishing the agency came into force on 30 October.

We have been pressing for a decision on location since the regulation to establish the agency was adopted more than three years ago. The decision means that the agency can now begin its work.

The EEA is an independent body which has been created to provide objective and reliable environmental information at the European level to help the EC and its member states formulate sound policies to protect the environment. The agency aims to achieve this through co-operation with those organisations in member states involved in environmental monitoring and research.

I am inviting all organisations which may wish to participate in the United Kingdom network, or to act as topic centres, to get in touch. To co-ordinate the network and liaise with the agency I have set up a national focus point within my Department.

The United Kingdom will, by 30 April 1994, notify the agency of the composition of its natural network and potential topic centre candidates. The network will include those organisations that regularly collect and supply environmental data within the United Kingdom.

Topic centres will undertake work on behalf of the EEA under contract and should have recognised research or technical expertise related to environmental monitoring and data analysis. Where appropriate, members of the national network can also be considered as topic centre candidates.

The United Kingdom attaches great importance to the development of the EEA. I hope that there will be considerable interest in the opportunities it offers. I would encourage all interested organisations to contact my officials for further details and a registration form as soon as possible.

Acid Rain

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in negotiations for a new United Nations agreement combating acid rain.

Mr. Gummer: While negotiations in Geneva are not yet complete, substantial progress has been made. It now seems likely that a widely acceptable text aiming at significant reductions of sulphur emissions, and which the United Kingdom expects to sign, will be opened for signature by the middle of 1994. The Government warmly welcome these developments, which will contribute to the progressive resolution of the acid rain problem.

The United Kingdom is prepared to reduce sulphur emissions by 70 per cent. by 2005 compared with 1980, and has indicated its willingness in principle to aim for reductions of 80 per cent. by 2010. The latest text, if agreed, will allow parties to achieve the targets in the most cost-effective and flexible way, taking account of national considerations.

The new protocol will build on the United Kingdom's achievements in reducing sulphur emissions by 30 per cent. by the end of this year from 1980 levels, thus complying with the requirements of the first sulphur protocol although we were not in a position to sign it at the time.

Direct Labour Organisations

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he took against those local authorities whose direct labour or services organisations made significant financial losses in 1991-92.

Mr. Baldry: I am very encouraged that, for more than 80 per cent. of the notices served in respect of 1991-92 DSO losses, further statutory action was not needed because authorities had already taken steps to address the losses. This is a very positive trend and I urge authorities to maintain their efforts here.

My right hon. Friend has now considered the responses of 15 authorities on which notices were served in June and September. He has today given directions under section 19B of the 1980 Act to Manchester city council, new construction work in excess of £50,000; and under section 14 of the 1988 Act to Bedfordshire county council, ground maintenance; Castlepoint borough council, ground maintenance; the London borough of Hillingdon, other catering; and South Bedfordshire district council, refuse collection. This brings the total number of directions given in respect of financial failure in 1991-92 to 11.

The effect of these directions is to require the authorities to seek the Secretary of State's consent if they wish to award the work, or elements of the work to their in-house labour force following re-tendering which is currently under way, planned or required by the direction.

He has decided to take no further action in respect of financial failure in 1991-92 by:

Barking and Dagenham, refuse collection; Corby, vehicle maintenance; Harrow, ground maintenance; Hillingdon, building cleaning; Leicestershire, ground maintenance; Northavon, vehicle maintenance; and Richmond upon Thames, ground maintenance; because they met financial objectives in 1992-93;

Hillingdon, school and welfare catering; and Kingston upon Hull, other catering; because despite recording losses in 1992-93, they have provided evidence that financial objectives will be met in 1993-94;

Ashford, ground maintenance and refuse collection; Brighton, other catering; and Castlepoint, other cleaning; because they have closed the DSO involved or are exploring other options, including privatisation;

Colchester, building maintenance; because the DLO now operates below the "de minimis" level.

Hillingdon and Kingston upon Hull have been asked to provide quarterly financial returns to the Department.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list, by authority, the surplus achieved since 1988 on trading accounts for (a) general highways work, (b) construction and maintenance of sewers, (c) works of new construction and (d) maintenance work, delivered by direct service or labour organisations in England under the terms of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980;

(2) if he will list by authority and service area, as defined by the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, the surpluses achieved by local authority direct service or labour organisations in England since 1988;

(3) if he will list, by authority, the surplus achieved since 1988 on trading accounts for (a) refuse collection, (b) street cleaning, (c) building cleaning, (d) schools and welfare catering, (e) other catering, (f) vehicle maintenance, (g) grounds maintenance and (h) sports and leisure management services delivered by direct service or labour organisations in England, under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988;

(4) if he will list by authority and service area, as defined by the Local Government Act 1988, the surpluses achieved by local authority direct service or labour organisations in England.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 3 December 1993]: One thousand eight hundred and sixteen of the local authority direct service or labour organisation accounts for 1991-92 received by my Department recorded surpluses. I shall send a detailed list to the hon. Member and place a copy in the Library. Information on 1992-93 is not yet complete. Figures for previous years could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Merseyside Housing

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the provision of the special needs allocation for housing on Merseyside; and how much money will be available for house improvements in the current and next financial year.

Sir George Young [holding answer 8 December 1993]: The future of the Housing Corporation's special allocation for Merseyside is being reviewed by officials from my Department and from the Housing Corporation. I expect to have recommendations before me in the spring.

In 1993-94, the specified capital grant allocation, which represents 60 per cent. of resources available for renovation grant activity, totalled £20·843 million for Merseyside. The allocation for 1994-95 will be announced later this month.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Council Of Ministers

14. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals she has made, in the light of the decisions of the European Councils in Edinburgh 1992 and Brussels 1993, to increase the transparency and accountability of decision-making, including the recording of votes of each member state, at meetings of European Community Councils of Ministers at which her Department is represented; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Government fully support the conclusions reached at Edinburgh and Brussels on openness.

The Foreign Affairs Council agreed on 6 December that votes in all Councils on legislative decisions will be published automatically unless a majority of the Council oppose this.

This procedure is fully consistent with the conclusions of the Edinburgh European Council last December.

Voting details are now published by the Council secretariat after Council meetings; we shall ensure that this information is provided to Parliament.

Common Agricultural Policy

15. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is her latest estimate of the net cost of the common agricultural policy to British consumers.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There is a significant net cost to United Kingdom consumers, and indeed United Kingdom tax payers, from the CAP. For a number of reasons, of which the hon. Gentleman will be aware, it is not possible to be precise about the figure estimate.

16. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total annual cost of the common agricultural policy before the latest reforms were implemented; and what is the projected total cost in the current year and in 1994 and 1995.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Expenditure in 1992 was 31·3 becu—£22·2 billion—and in 1993 is estimated at 35·1 becu—£27·6 billion. The draft budget for 1994, the first full year in which the budgetary impact of CAP reform will be felt, has been set at 36·5 becu—£28·1 billion. Estimates for 1995 are not available as budgets are not set more than one year in advance.

23. Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she next expects to meet her EC counterparts to discuss reform of the CAP.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regularly meet my EC colleagues, both bilaterally and at meetings of the Agriculture Council.

Further reform of the CAP is among the range of topics covered at such meetings.

Animal Transportation

17. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations she has made about the transport of live animals in the EC.

Mr. Soames: The Government are pressing for major improvements to the Community legislation and for strong enforcement of the rules in all member states.

Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many live animals have been transported from the United Kingdom to Spain for slaughter since it has been permissible to do so.

Mr. Soames: A total of 2,770 sheep have been consigned to Spain for immediate slaughter since 1 January 1993, when new arrangements came into force.

Farms, Northumberland

18. Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture Fisheries and Food what plans she now has to visit farms in Northumberland following the cancellation of her recent planned visit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I was disappointed that the temporary closure of Newcastle airport due to snow forced me to postpone my visit.

However, I met a delegation of Northumbrian farmers in London on 29 November.

The visit will be rearranged as soon as possible.

Fishing

20. Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations she has received from the fishing industry since 5 July.

Mr. Jack: I have had various meetings with fishing industry organisations and with individual fishermen. In addition to these contacts, I have received formal proposals on conservation from the Scottish Fisherman's Federation and from the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations.

24. Mr. Booth: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps are being taken to reduce the fishing effort of the United Kingdom's fishing fleet.

Mr. Jack: We hope to make an announcement shortly.

Forestry

21. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she last met the chairman of the Forestry Commission to discuss the progress of the forest policy review; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I met the chairman of the Forestry Commission early last month when we had a brief exchange exchange of views on the work of the forestry review group.

26. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what indications she has received from the interdepartmental forestry review group on the future of the Forest Enterprise estate.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The forestry review group has not yet presented its advice to Ministers.

We are expecting to receive its report early next year.

Helpline Unit

22. Mr. Richards: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many calls have been made to the helpline unit since 24 May; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Since its launch on 24 May, the helpline has quickly established itself as a central contact point on a broad range of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food activities.

In its first six months the helpline unit has received over 14,000 calls.

25. Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether she proposes to introduce any new measures dealing with food hygiene matters.

Mr. Soames: The European Community single market hygiene measures for specific sectors, such as milk and milk products and meat products, are at various stages of implementation into our national law.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is responsible for general food hygiene legislation, where it is planned to introduce next year new regulations to implement the hygiene of foodstuffs directive.

Agricultural Wages Board

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement on the future of the Agricultural Wages Board.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Hall).

Milk Quota

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what powers she has to ensure that no transfers of milk quota that are invalid or fraudulent are recorded in the register; and what steps she takes to ensure that the register is rectified and accurately maintained.

Mr. Jack: The quota register is amended following the submission of a duly completed quota transfer form. In cases where the parties concerned dispute the quota apportionment, or where the Minister has reasonable grounds for believing that a correct apportionment of quota has not been made, the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1993 provide for the matter to be referred to arbitration. Pre-processing checks are made on a number of transfer forms to establish that there has, indeed, been a change in occupation of the land used for milk production. Where no such change of occupation is established, the transfer form would be rejected. Any party who contravenes the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations or the relevant EC legislation, or who makes a false statement, is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a substantial fine.

Agricultural Workers' Earnings

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest available figure for the average earnings of part-time female agricultural workers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jack: Estimates of earnings of agricultural workers are available from sample surveys. The average hourly earnings for part-time hired female agricultural workers in the United Kingdom for the year ended June 1993 is estimated at £3·67 per hour. This includes payments for overtime, holidays, annual bonus, perquisites and other payments.

Agri-environment Programme

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations she has received on the funding of the Government's agri-environment programme.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Many people urged me not to cut funding of our agri-environment programme and I have recently confirmed that we are holding to our plans to increase expenditure to over £70 million per annum by 1995-96.

Pâté de Foie

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make it her policy to discourage the consumption of pâté de foie.

Mr. Soames: People must be allowed to decide for themselves what they eat.

The Government should neither encourage or discourage the consumption of a particular type of food, provided that the total diet is healthy and well-balanced.

The Government are nevertheless concerned at the animal welfare aspects of pâté de foie gras production involving force feeding. They have made it clear they would seek legislation to ban this practice if there was a prospect of it developing in the United Kingdom.

It would, however, be illegal under the treaty of Rome to prohibit imports from other Community countries.

Abattoirs

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what changes she has made to meat inspection at abattoirs regulations in the last month;

(2) what representations she has received on changes to meat inspection at abattoirs in the past month.

Mr. Soames: We have made no changes in the last month to the Fresh Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations 1992—SI 1992/2037—governing meat inspection in abattoirs, nor have we received any representations raising new concerns about meat inspection arrangements during this period.

The Government announced on 22 October a seven-point plan of deregulation in the meat industry. The plan signals a move to a less prescriptive system of meat hygiene enforcement while continuing to protect public health.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the rules for farmers' own use of slaughter of animals at small abattoirs.

Mr. Soames: The Fresh Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations 1992—SI 1992/2037—do not apply to the slaughter in abattoirs of animals whose flesh is not intended for sale for human consumption. Animals slaughtered for a farmer's own use in a small abattoir will, therefore, not count towards any weekly throughput limit. The rules governing the slaughter of these animals in abattoirs are the same as those applicable to animals slaughtered on the farm: they must be slaughtered humanely, in accordance with the provisions of the Protection of Animals Act 1911, chapter 27, and, in the case of bovines, specified bovine offal must be disposed of in accordance with the Bovine Offal (Prohibition) Regulations 1989—SI 1989/2061 as amended by SIs 1990/2468 and 1992/306.

Fur Farms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement on fur farming.

Mr. Soames: Welfare conditions are monitored regularly by the state veterinary service and we are seeking European Community legislation to set standards for all fur farms.

Security standards for mink farms are set by the Mink (Keeping) Order 1992.

EDUCATION

Parental Choice, Wandsworth

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) what plans he has to ensure that parents living within the London borough of Wandsworth will continue to have the right to choose the school of their choice for their children to attend; and what discussions he has had with the borough about this matter;

(2) what discussions he is having with the London Borough of Wandsworth about selective entry schools in the borough; what plans he has to ensure that such schools will still take children of mixed ability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: Under section 8 of the Education Act 1944, local education authorities have a duty to ensure that there are sufficient schools to provide education for all pupils in their area taking account of their age, ability and aptitude. This will continue to be the case under the Education Act 1993 until the sole responsibility for ensuring a sufficiency of schools in the primary or secondary phase, as the case may be, passes to the Funding Agency for Schools under the provisions of section 12 of that Act.

My right hon. Friend will continue to consider on their merits any proposals by Wandsworth council to implement its policy of diversity and choice in the borough's schools.

Education Authorities (Capital Assets)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the value of capital assets held by local education authorities; and which are held for the purposes of individual schools and which are occupied for other purposes.

Mr. Forth: The replacement capital value of local education authority school buildings in England is estimated to be £36·8 billion million. This includes the cost of furniture and equipment and building design fees. Additionally the land value of school sites is estimated to be £3·8 billion. Information is not held centrally on the extent to which schools are occupied for other purposes.

Goods and Services (VAT)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, pursuant to his answer of 1 December, Official Report, column 571, if he will list the supply of goods and services incidental to the supply of education by sixth form colleges and further education colleges which are exempt from value added tax.

Mr. Boswell: Item 4 of group 6, schedule 6 to the Value Added Tax Act 1983, as amended, specifies that the supply of any goods or services incidental to the provision of any education or training provided by a college in the FEFC sector is exempt from VAT. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise VAT leaflet 701/30/87, which is available in the Library, gives examples of the type of incidental goods and services covered by this exemption. They include educational materials such as pens, ink and exercise books, most catering supplies and accommodation.

Primary Schools (Class Sizes)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the number of primary school children in (a) January 1992 and (b) January 1993, being taught in classes of more than 30; and what was the percentage change.

Mr. Robin Squire: In January 1992 there were 1,075,000 pupils in classes of more than 30 in maintained primary schools in England compared with 1,142,000—provisional—in January 1993, a rise of 6 per cent.

Nursery Education

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is his latest estimate of the proportion of three-year-olds in local authority nursery education classes.

Mr. Robin Squire: Latest figures show that in England 39 per cent. of children aged three at the beginning of the 1992-93 school year were being taught in maintained—local education authority and grant-maintained—nursery schools and nursery classes in January 1993 when the annual pupil count is conducted.

Capital Credit Approval

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what amount has been requested by way of capital credit approval for each local education authority in 1994-95.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is in the table. The figures are taken from the capital plans for 1994-95 submitted by each local education authority to the Department.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Public Appointments

Mr. Heald: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what further progress has been made in appointing more women as members of public bodies.

Mr. Waldegrave: Women have been appointed to some 40 per cent. of all new appointments made in the last 12 months. This is a further welcome improvement and demonstrates our continuing efforts to ensure that women can play their proper part in our public life. The percentage of public appointments held by women is now 28 per cent. which is a further increase of 2 per cent. since September 1992 on top of the 3 per cent. increase in the previous year. Full details will be published in due course in the 1993 edition of "Public Bodies".

Mr. Heald: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many public appointments are currently held by members of the ethnic minorities; and what plans the Government have to increase this number.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following the introduction last year of ethnic monitoring of public appointees, the statistics collected showed that at 1 September 1992, 2 per cent. of all appointments to public bodies were held by members of the ethnic minorities. The latest figures, full details of which will be published shortly in "Public Bodies", show that this has now increased to 2·3 per cent.

A few departments have already set their own goals for further increases but it is not practical for all departments to set such a goal. The Government aim progressively to increase the number of public appointments of members of ethnic minorities in order more closely to reflect their contribution to national life. Currently nearly 5 per cent. of the economically active population are members of the ethnic minorities.

TRANSPORT

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the Ministers in his Department who since June 1987 have visited (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malaysia, (c) Singapore and (d) South Africa on official business; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

Mr. Norris: Since the election in April 1992, there has only been one visit by a Department of Transport Minister to the four countries named. This was by me to Singapore in October 1993. No party political activities were included in this visit. Owing to changes of Ministers and personnel, it would incur disproportionate cost to retrieve the information on visits before the last election.

Drink Driving

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the maximum legal limit on blood alcohol levels for drivers in each EC country.

Mr. Key: The information requested, in milligrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres of blood, is as follows:

	milligrammes
The Netherlands	50
Portugal	50
Belgium	80
Denmark	80
France	80
Germany	[1,2]80
Greece	[3]80
Italy	80
Luxembourg	80
Spain	80
United Kingdom	80
Ireland	100

[1] Germany has not adopted a common limit after unification.

[2] (0 in the former Democratic Republic).

[3] For the general drink/drive offence but the power exists to charge motorists at 50 mg/ml if an accident has taken place.

Bicycle Helmets

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to make the wearing of bicycle helmets compulsory.

Mr. Key: None. Bicycle helmets have been proven to reduce significantly both the number and the severity of head injuries. We therefore encourage cyclists, particularly children, to wear them.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Welfare Adaptations

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will give the date of receipt of an application for welfare adaptations at 17 O'Reilly park, Killeen, Newry, and the dates when the application was referred to the occupational therapist; when an occupational therapist report was received; when an architect was appointed; and when work is due to be completed;

(2) if he will give details of the reasons for delays in processing the application for welfare adaptations for 17 O'Reilly park, Killeen, Newry.

Mr. Atkins: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive but I understand from the chief executive that a verbal application was received in early January 1993 and referred to the occupational therapist on 7 January 1993 whose report was received on 29 January 1993.

A Housing Executive architect was appointed to carry out a feasibility study on 2 February 1993 and this was completed in May 1993. The scheme was passed to a consultant architect in June 1993 for detailed plans to be drawn up. These plans required amendments to incorporate comprehensive improvements to the dwelling which were brought forward to minimise disruption to the tenants.

The detailed plans were completed on 22 November 1993 and were approved by the Housing Executive on 2 December 1993. The work is due to start in January 1994 and be completed by April 1994. The work should commence within the target timescale recently set by the Executive for carrying out major adaptations which involve an extension to a disabled person's home.

Daisy Hill Hospital

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which organisations have been consulted over the membership of the proposed Daisy Hill hospital trust; and which organisations have been invited to nominate members to the trust.

Mr. Ancram: Apart from the period of public consultation on the application for trust status, my noble colleague, Lord Arran, advises me that he has not consulted on the membership of the Newry and Mourne health and social services trust, of which Daisy Hill hospital is a part.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the role of the lay helper in the creation of the Daisy Hill hospital trust.

Mr. Ancram: The position of lay helpers in any trust is formal, voluntary and unpaid. Their role is to assist in drawing up the formal application, giving potential trusts access to the types of skills and experience which non-executive members are expected to bring to the trust board, and to identify potential candidates for appointment as non-executive directors on the board of the trust.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consultations have taken place with the district councils in the Southern region, with members of the Southern health and social services board, or with hon. Members with constituencies covering parts of the Southern region, regarding the membership of the Daisy Hill hospital trust.

Mr. Ancram: None.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what appointments have been made to the board of the shadow Daisy Hill hospital trust.

Mr. Ancram: Mr. John McEvoy, former lay helper, has been appointed chairman of the Newry and Mourne health and social services trust for a period of four years from 23

November 1993. My noble colleague, Lord Arran, hopes to be able shortly to announce the names of the non-executive directors for the new trust.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consultations he or his colleagues had with the Southern health and social services board regarding the membership of the board of the proposed Daisy Hill hospital trust.

Mr. Ancram: None.

Spina Bifida

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the incidence of spina bifida among newborn infants in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: In 1992 the incidence was 0·78 per 1,000 total registered births.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what steps he is taking to reduce the incidence of spina bifida among newborn babies;

(2) what information he has concerning the use of vitamin supplementation for women in their main child-bearing years as a means of reducing cases of spina bifida; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: An expert advisory group report on folic acid and the prevention of neural tube defects, published in December 1992, confirmed evidence that women who increase their intake of folic acid when planning a pregnancy can significantly reduce the risk of having a baby with neural tube defect such as spina bifida. The report was immediately issued to all doctors, senior nurses, midwives and health visitors with a request that all women planning a pregnancy be advised to increase their consumption of folic acid. Health education material has been revised to incorporate this advice and a new public campaign using leaflets and posters was launched last month.

EMPLOYMENT

Training, Birmingham

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the training providers providing training for work programmes funded by Birmingham training and enterprise council.

Miss Widdecombe: I understand that the hon. Member is to meet the chief executive of the Birmingham training and enterprise council on 13 December. The TEC has agreed to supply him then with the list which he seeks.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he takes to monitor the financial viability of training and enterprise councils; and what contingency plans he has in the event that a training and enterprise council becomes unable to meet its contractual obligations.

Miss Widdecombe: Training and enterprise councils are contractually required to provide the Department with regular financial information. This information is carefully analysed by qualified staff to assess the continuing financial viability of individual TECs. The Department is in a position to make suitable alternative arrangements if a TEC ceased to be financially viable.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people became unemployed in England each month since January 1991; and how many were re-employed within six months.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is only available for people whose claims are processed by computer—99 per cent. of the total. It can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the Library. Of those becoming claimant unemployed, about two thirds leave within six months. The majority leave to go into employment.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the unemployment figures for the Tooting constituency in each of the last 10 years as of 30 November of each year.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is given in the table. The figure for November 1993 will be published on 16 December.

Claimant unemployment, on the unadjusted basis, for each November in the Tooting constituency

Year	Total
1983	5,336
1984	5,630
1985	5,687
1986	5,657
1987	4,496

Suspension of Benefit

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what criteria he applies in exercising his discretionary power to suspend benefit under regulation 37 of the Social Security (Claims and Payments Regulations); and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. David Lidington, dated 10 December 1993:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about Regulation 37 of the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Regulations.

Under Section 37(1)(c) of the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Regulations the Secretary of State may direct that payment of benefit due as a result of a decision of a Social Security Appeal Tribunal (SSAT) may be suspended if the adjudication officer considers that a further appeal to a Commissioner may be appropriate.

The power to suspend benefit is discretionary and is exercised on behalf of the Secretary of State by my officers. If, following a decision of an SSAT, the adjudication officer wishes to appeal to the Commissioner, my local office is requested not to implement the decision pending a further appeal.

An appeal to a Commissioner can only be made on a point of law. The adjudication officer must therefore consider that the decision of the SSAT is wrong in law before making an application for leave to appeal. The most common errors of law are; the misinterpretation of provisions of the Act or regulations; no facts are found, or no reasons are given for the decision; irrelevant considerations have been taken into account; relevant evidence has been ignored; the explanation of the decision discloses faulty reasoning.

Although my officers, acting on behalf of the Secretary of State, are not bound to comply with the adjudication officer's request to suspend the payment of benefit, my people in my local offices are not specifically trained to interpret Social Security law. They will, therefore, rely on the expertise of the adjudication officer where it is considered that an SSAT may have made an error in law. In practice, this means that benefit is always suspended in these cases unless there are good reasons, specific to the case, for not doing so.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the funding for each training and enterprise council in 1993-94, quantifying how much is to be spent on training for work, youth training, local initiative funds, administration and other projects.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) on 3 December 1993, Official Report, column 821. This lists the funding for each training and enterprise council, including training for work, youth training, local initiative fund, administration—management fee—and other projects.

Youth Training

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has had regarding the levels of allowance paid to those on youth training schemes; what plans there are to alter the allowance in any way; what prospects there are to increase the allowance or alter the payment structure; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: I have had a number of representations regarding the levels of the youth training —YT—allowance. There are no plans to increase minimum YT allowances. Minimum YT allowances are set at levels which reflect the fact that trainees are involved in the learning process and I believe current levels are sufficient to meet the normal requirements of trainees living in the parental home.

Trainees who are employed are paid a wage by their employers. Employers benefit from considerable Government investment in the training of young people and are therefore encouraged to pay trainees more than the specified minimum rates of allowance wherever possible.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a table showing for each standard region, with Greater London shown as a separate region, the total expenditure in 1992-93, and the budgeted expenditure in 1993-94, 1994-95 and 1995-96, in respect of (a) estates action, (b) housing action trusts, (c) city challenge/urban programme, (d) urban regeneration agency/city grant/derelict land grant, (e) urban development corporations, (f) inner-city task forces and (g) city action teams.

For 1994-95 onwards, these programmes will transfer to the single regeneration budget, which will be administered by the integrated regional offices. A regional breakdown for 1994-95 and 1995-96 is not currently available.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will publish the latest estimate available to his Department of the number of passengers expected to use the Cutty Sark station on the Docklands light railway extension;

(2) if he will itemise and cost each of the savings made to reduce the cost of the Jubilee line extension to Greenwich and Lewisham.

Mr. Baldry: The London Docklands development corporation, the owners of the railway, have made projections of potential passenger traffic at stations along the new extension. Annual projected passenger movements for a station at Cutty Sark rise from 1·4 million when it opens in 1997-98 to 2·5 million in 2001. Forecasts indicate that if Cutty Sark were not to be provided, the majority of potential passengers would use the new Docklands light railway station at Greenwich instead. The Government have asked the London Docklands development corporation and the Docklands light railway to consult local interests on the deletion of these stations before a final decision is made.

Provision of a new station at Cutty Sark would cost an estimated £13 million; at Island Gardens an estimated £4 million. The original estimate of costs also included £10 million for initial rolling stock which are now to be provided by Docklands light railway as operators of the extension. Other potential cost reductions may result from a fall in the land acquisition costs and from minor changes in the project's specifications.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria of viability he has applied to the future of the Island Gardens and Cutty Sark stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The Department, together with the owners of the railway, the London Docklands development corporation, and Docklands Light Railway Limited itself, has made an assessment of the financial viability of the extension to Lewisham in the light of independent merchant banking advice. The conclusion was that the forecast incremental revenue from passengers on the extension could not finance the full project as previously costed—at £140 million. A review of the capital and operating costs of the project has indicated provisionally that the new stations proposed for Island Gardens and Cutty Sark will need to be deleted in order to make the project as a whole viable. These stations would be situated underground at each end of the new tunnel taking the railway under the Thames and would involve much higher costs of construction and operation than the ground level stations along the line. The forecast revenue from both stations would cover only the estimated running costs of those stations and would not be sufficient to contribute towards the capital costs of their construction.

The Government have asked the London Docklands development corporation and Docklands Light Railway Limited to consult local interests including businesses before a final decision is made on whether to delete the stations.

The Government have consistently supported this project on the condition that no Government grant or subsidy will be made available. That remains the position. Nevertheless, approval has been given for the project to proceed as a joint venture between the private and public sectors, with capital contributions being made by Lewisham council, South Thames training and enterprise council and Deptford city challenge.

Integrated Sub-Office (Plymouth)

Mr. Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will establish an integrated departmental sub-office in Plymouth to serve Devon and Cornwall as part of his programme of integrated regional offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: We will consider how best the new office in the south west can deliver its services across the whole region in consultation with the senior regional director following his or her appointment.

Environmental Protection Act 1990

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many responses were received to the consultation paper of March proposing amendments to the scope of part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990; and when he proposes to consult on draft amending regulations.

Mr. Yeo: Two hundred and fifty responses were received to the consultation paper. These have now been considered and I am most grateful to those who sent in their views.

I have today issued a second consultation paper which contains a statistical summary of these responses and invites comments on draft regulations to amend the prescribed processes and substances regulations.

I am pleased to say that a substantial proportion of the amendments should have the effect of lightening the burden on business. The regulations will continue to ensure that processes with the greatest pollution potential still come under the stringent controls introduced by part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. But we have identified cases where businesses had to meet more onerous requirements than were necessary, and opportunities for cutting red tape, for example by reducing the number of authorisations needed by certain processes.

A copy of the consultation paper has been placed in the Library of both Houses.

WALES

Badgers

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many badgers were shot or gassed in each county in each of the last three years; and how many of these were subsequently shown to have tuberculosis.

Mr. Redwood: The number of badgers killed, following trapping during state veterinary service badger removal operations, in Wales since 1 January 1991 is as follows:

Year	Number of badgers killed	Number positive
1992	—	—
[1]1993	10	0

[1] Up to 6 December 1993.

The figures relate to the county of Dyfed. No badgers have been killed by the state veterinary service in any other county in Wales in the last three years. The legal gassing of badgers ceased on 26 June 1982.

Departmental Accounts

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the discrepancies of his departmental approporiation accounts 1992-93, Paper 11-xi, identified by the Comptroller and Auditor General in his report of 2 December.

Mr. Redwood: The Comptroller and Auditor General —C and AG—reported and qualified his audit opinion on three of the Welsh Office's 1992-93 appropriation accounts within class XVI. On vote 4, he found that > "erroneous payments to Training and Enterprise Councils (TECs) continue to exist at significant levels following the transfer of responsibility from the Department of Employment" on 1 April 1992; an understatement, as a result mainly of the incorrect assessment of benefit entitlements, of certain payments made through the Employment Service Agency —ESA. He notes in paragraphs 16-18 and 26-27 the efforts which my Department, TECs and the ESA have devoted to putting these matters right. I recently met the chairmen of all the TECs in Wales, to stress my determination that fully effective systems should be maintained. They agree with me.

On vote 5, the C and AG reported on the progress made in auditing the outstanding claims, brought to Parliament's attention when he qualified his opinion on the 1991-92 accounts, for payments made to highway authorities over the period from 1974 to 1990, and on clearance of claims relating to 1990-91. He has confirmed that the systems now in place have allowed the Welsh Office to record satisfactorily advances made since April 1990. Local authorities too should ensure they accurately record these sums and their use.

On vote 11, an error in the method of calculating sums due to authorities in respect of community charge grant let to four overpayments in March 1993; the sums were all recovered by 30 September.

Public Appointments

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if it is necessary for appointment to a non-departmental public body in Wales that a candidate has been included in the register held by the Welsh Office for public appointments.

Mr. Redwood: No, although many names are drawn from the departmental register. Candidates for public appointments may also be nominated by organisations, Members of Parliament and the Cabinet Office public appointments unit. All candidates are considered on their merits irrespective of the source of nomination.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has reached a decision on the level of resources to be devoted to regional selective assistance, the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales in 1994-95.

Mr. Redwood: A demand for regional aid, from both Welsh companies and inward investors is still high and I am increasing the money available for regional selective assistance to £67 million to meet that demand.

Grant in aid for the Welsh Development Agency will be increased by almost £10 million, a rise of nearly 16 per cent. The board believes overall expenditure of £167 million can be achieved for 1994-95, given its ability to sell assets. This will enable the agency to build on its success in attracting inward investment to Wales and to continue its support for our indigenous businesses.

The budget of the Development Board for Rural Wales will also increase, to almost £17 million, bringing its expected overall expenditure in 1994-95 to over £27 million. This increase will enable the board to continue its business park developments at Penrhyndeudraeth and Cardigan, to develop its programmes for the western areas which suffer most from rural decline, and to continue to support the Wales tourist board's Tourism 2000 strategy.

HEALTH

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many beds are provided currently by the Brighton health care NHS trust; how many were proposed in the original redevelopment plan; and how many are proposed under the latest, revised plans drawn up by the trust.

Dr. Mawinney: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. John Spiers, chairman of Brighton health care national health service trust for details.

Mersey Regional Health Authority

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many personnel are currently employed in administration and how many are employed in clinical services in Mersey regional health authority; and how many have been so employed for each of the last 10 years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is shown in the table.

GP Fund-holders

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the population of Berkshire is registered at (a) fund-holding and (b) non-fund-holding general practices.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally. Regional health authorities are responsible for managing the general practitioner fund-holding scheme in their areas. Nationally 25 per cent. of the population is covered by GP fund-holders. In Oxford region this is 33 per cent.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of general practitioners, and the total number of secretaries, administrators, receptionists, and practice managers in general practice in each of the last five years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The available information is shown in the tables.

	1 October 1989	1 October 1990	1 October 1991	1 October 1992	1 April 1993
Numbers of GPs	25,608	25,622	25,686	25,968	26,116

The data relate to England:

Staff type	1 October 1989	1 October 1990	1 October 1991	1 October 1992	1 April 1993
Management and administration	n/a	4,595	5,679	6,147	6,147
Secretary/clerical	4,043	30,576	10,495	11,166	11,109
Receptionist	22,535	—	20,824	21,331	20,862

1. The data relate to whole time equivalent staff in England.
2. No data for management and administrative staff are available for 1989; the figure for 1990 relates only to practice managers.
3. The figure for the secretary/clerical category for 1989 relates only to clerical staff; secretaries are included with receptionists. The 1990 figure for secretary/clerical category includes receptionists.
4. The number of GPs in England has risen steadily since 1979 and now currently stands at an all-time high. The increase in administration staff employed by GPs enables them to delegate much of the day to day business of running a practice. This in turn provides the opportunity for GPs to devote more time to the delivery of clinical care to their patients. While the number of administration staff has increased it should be noted that the number of practice nurses has risen from 888 to 9,120 whole time equivalents an increase of over 900 per cent. between 1 October 1989 and 1 April 1993.

NHS Users

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the population using the national health service are (a) female and (b) members of an ethnic minority.

Mr. Sackville: Of all in-patient episodes recorded in England for 1989-90, the latest year for which information is available, 57·6 per cent. of cases were recorded as female. Of episodes with a diagnostic code other than complications of pregnancy, childbirth and the puerperium, 52·1 per cent. of cases were recorded.

Information is not collected centrally on patients' ethnic group, although we are currently consulting on the principle of doing so in respect of in-patients.

Diseases

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of (a) dysentery, (b) typhoid, (c) paratyphoid, (d) malaria, (e) TB and (f) jaundice were reported for England and Wales in each year since 1988.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Notifications of selected infectious diseases reported in England and Wales 1988-92

Disease	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992
Dysentery	3,692	3,278	2,756	9,935	16,960
Typhoid	174	164	178	182	201
Paratyphoid	180	88	93	99	81
Malaria	1,271	1,478	1,493	1,553	1,189
Tuberculosis	5,164	5,432	5,204	5,436	5,799
Viral hepatitis[1]	5,063	7,071	9,005	8,860	8,993

[1] Infective jaundice was redesignated viral hepatitis on 1 October 1988.

The rise in notifications of viral hepatitis seen between 1988 and 1990 was due to increased notifications of hepatitis A infection. This rise was consistent with the regular peaks in incidence of hepatitis A seen every seven to nine years.

The rise in notification of dysentery in 1992 was seen in all major conurbations other than London. Trends in dysentery also exhibit a periodicity, with peaks every seven to eight years, although the peak in 1992 was higher than other peaks in the previous two decades.

NHS Expenditure

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how she plans to spend the extra money for the NHS announced in the Budget; and what percentage of it will be spent on administration.

Dr. Mawhinney: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, announced allocations to regional health authorities for 1994-95 on 7 December at columns 198-200. Revenue allocations will rise by an average of 1·3 per cent. above inflation. In addition, health authorities have been given a 2·25 per cent. efficiency target, to ensure existing resources are used to improve patient services. Health authorities and trusts should reduce their administrative costs as far as they can, consistent with sound management of the £22 billion spent on the hospital and community health services. My right hon. Friend recently announced our proposals for streamlining the management structure of the national health service. This will result in further substantial savings in administrative costs so we can maximise the proportion of NHS expenditure devoted to direct patient care.

It is for individual health authorities to determine their own purchasing priorities within the framework of the NHS Management Executive's planning and priorities guidance for 1994-95, EL(93)54 published in June, copies of which are available in the Library.

Junior Doctors

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give the figures from the returns for September showing how many junior doctors are contracted for an average of more than 83 hours per week, nationally and by region.

Dr. Mawhinney: The number of junior doctors and dentists in England contracted for more than a maximum average of 83 hours a week, at 30 September, is as follows:

Region	Number
Northern	0
Yorkshire	5
Trent	0
East Anglian	4
North West Thames	1
North East Thames	32
South East Thames	5
South West Thames	2
Wessex	0
Oxford	0
West Midlands	42
Mersey	0

Region	Number
North Western	0
ENGLAND	91

Regional task forces are monitoring these remaining posts closely to ensure that they are eliminated as quickly as possible.

Leukaemia

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to ensure that the national health service has adequate specialist beds for the treatment of leukaemia.

Mr. Sackville: We are not aware of any evidence to suggest that the clinical facilities currently available for the specialist treatment of patients with leukaemia are in any way inadequate.

Health Authorities

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many chairmen of health authorities in England received emoluments exceeding £500 per attendance in the last 12 months;

(2) how many non-executive directors of health authorities in England received emoluments which exceeded £500 per attendance in the last 12 months.

Dr. Mawhinney: Chairmen and non-executive members of health authorities receive an annual remuneration and are not paid on the basis of attendance.

The amount of emoluments paid to individual chairmen and non-executive members of health authorities is not available centrally.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what powers (a) a district health authority/and (b) a family health services authority have to withold from publication any report on an agenda item to be considered in public session.

Dr. Mawhinney: District health authorities and family health services authorities are public bodies to which the provisions of the Public Bodies (Admissions to Meetings) Act 1960 apply. Unless a resolution has been passed by the board to exclude the public on grounds of confidentiality, the public would be entitled to attend meetings and to obtain relevant papers.

NHS Management Executive

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to instruct the NHS Management Executive regional offices to hold meetings in public after the abolition of regional health authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: We have no such plans. The abolition of regional health authorities is subject to the passage through Parliament of the proposed Bill.

Printing Costs

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost to the NHS of printing and publishing, by each regional health authority, documents for the information of the public.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to contact the chief executives of the regional health authorities for details.

Spina Bifida

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the rate of spina bifida among newborn babies.

Mr. Sackville: In 1992, the rate per 10,000 total births—live and still—was 1·2 for spina bifida in England and Wales.

NHS Patients (Repatriation)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have been flown back from abroad in each year since 1990; and what was the cost to the NHS.

Dr. Mawhinney: Neither United Kingdom nor European Community legislation contains any power allowing national health service funds to be used to defray repatriation costs incurred outside the United Kingdom by United Kingdom residents. There is no central record of numbers privately repatriated by air.

Young People (Supervision)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the average monthly cost of keeping a young person in secure accommodation in the last year for which figures are available;

(2) what was the average monthly cost of supervision under the Children and Young Persons Acts for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

Random Breath Testing

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which EC countries have a policy of random breath testing by the police.

Mr. Key: I have been asked to reply.

Police powers vary from country to country and information about precise breath testing procedures in each EC country is not available.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91; and how many vehicles were involved.

Sir John Cope: Information relating to expenditure by the Treasury for the use of Government car service cars by Ministers in 1990-91 is not now readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The figure for 1991-92 was £260,355. Five cars were allocated to Treasury Ministers on long-term hire.

Pensioners

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what are the most recent estimates of the number of people who are (a) under state retirement age and (b) over state retirement age, and receiving a pension from a recognised scheme, giving in each case the number who are (i) non-taxpayers, (ii) basic rate taxpayers and (iii) higher rate taxpayers, in the United Kingdom;

(2) what are the most recent estimates of the number of people who are (a) under state retirement age and (b) over state retirement age, and receiving (i) an occupational pension and (ii) a personal pension, giving in each case the number who are (1) non-taxpayers, (2) basic rate taxpayers and (3) higher rate taxpayers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: The latest estimates of the number of people in receipt of an occupational pension in 1993-94 are in the table. Information is not available on the number of people receiving personal pensions.

	Number in receipt of an occupational pension (thousands)
	Aged under 65	Aged 65 or over
Lower rate taxpayers	400	1,000
Basic rate taxpayers	900	1,100
Higher rate taxpayers	70	80

Taxation

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average individual cumulative gain (a) in cash prices and (b) in 1993-94 prices to those earning (i) £5,000, (ii) £10,000, (ii) £15,000, (iv) £20,000, (v) £25,000, (vi) £30,000, (vii) £40,000, (viii) £50,000, (ix) £60,000 and (x) £100,000, as a result of each change in (1) income tax and (2) income tax and national insurance, since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates of the reduction in liability resulting from changes in national insurance and income tax rates, allowances and thresholds are in the table. The 1978-79 income tax regime has been indexed to 1993-94 levels by reference to the statutory formula and allowing for independent taxation.

Comparison between 1993-94 and 1978-79 indexed regimes

	Average reduction (£) in:
Range of individuals income in 1993-94 (£)	Income tax	Income tax and national insurance contributions
Under 5,000	140	170
5,000 – 10,000	380	360
10,000 – 15,000	740	630
15,000 – 20,000	1,080	820
20,000 – 25,000	1,460	960
25,000 – 30,000	1,860	1,290
30,000 – 40,000	2,240	1,670
40,000 – 50,000	3,380	2,810
50,000 – 60,000	5,760	5,210
60,000 – 70,000	8,700	8,100
70,000 – 80,000	13,000	12,400
Over 80,000	47,700	47,200
Average	1,200	1,010

I regret that a reliable analysis of taxpayers with incomes over £100,000 is not available.

For the purposes of the calculations, the indexed regime of 1978-79 has been applied directly to the income base of 1993-94. In practice retention of the 1978-79 regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the reduction in income tax in 1993-94 compared with the 1978-79 indexed regime, broken down into the top 1 per cent., 5 per cent., 10 per cent. and bottom 50 per cent. of taxpayers, showing the total reduction and the average gain.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates on the annual reduction in income tax liability for 1993-94 compared with the 1978-79 indexed regime are given in the table. The 1978-79 regime has been indexed by reference to the statutory formula and allowing for independent taxation. For the purpose of these calculations the indexed regime of 1978-79 is applied directly to the later income base of 1993-94. In practice, retention of the regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

Quantile group of taxpayers under the 1978-79 indexed regime (Per cent.)	Nos. of tax-payers (Thousands)	Reduction in tax (£ million)	Average gain (£)
Top 1	300	9,600	35,800
Top 5	1,300	13,400	10,000

Bottom 50	13,300	4,500	340
All taxpayers	26,700	31,800	1,200

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the regional distribution of (a) the personal tax burden and (b) the overall tax burden.

Mr. Dorrell: The table shows the amount of income tax payable by region for 1991-92, the latest year for which regional information is available. Regional information for taxes overall is not available.

Region	Amount of income tax liability of residents (£ million)
North	2,710
Yorkshire and Humberside	4,840
North West	6,360
East Midlands	4,300
West Midland	5,210
East Anglia	2,560
South East	28,800
South West	5,270
Wales	2,500
Scotland	5,170
Northern Ireland	1,050

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people and what percentage of all taxpayers in (a) Great Britain and (b) Northern Ireland paid the top rate of income tax in each year since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: The table provides estimates of the number of taxpayers in the United Kingdom liable to income tax at a higher rate—that is any rate above the basic rate. Prior to the introduction of independent taxation in 1990-91, married couples are counted as one unit. It is not possible for the Northern Ireland component to be reliably distinguished for each of these years separately. However, for the years pre-independent taxation, 1980-81 to 1989-90, the number of higher rate taxpayers in Northern Ireland averaged about 20,000, about 4 per cent. of all taxpayers in Northern Ireland. It is estimated that there were 22,000 higher rate taxpaying individuals in Northern Ireland in 1991-92, which is around 4¼ per cent. of all taxpaying individuals in the province.

Taxpayers liable at higher rate, 1978-79 to 1993-94[1]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each region of the United Kingdom (a) the number of higher rate taxpayers, (b) the number of basic rate taxpayers and (c) the number that pay no national insurance or income tax.

Mr. Dorrell: The information shown in the table is the latest available on a regional basis and is for 1991-92.

VAT

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much value added tax was paid per annum by a family consisting of a married man on half of average male earnings, his wife and two children in 1978-79; and what is the most recent estimate;

(2) what estimate he has as to the average VAT paid per annum by a family consisting of a married man on (a) half of, (b) three quarters of, (c) twice and (d) three times average male earnings, his wife and two children in 1978-79; and what is the most recent estimate.

Sir John Cope: Estimates of VAT payments outside the range of three quarters to one-and-a-half times average earnings are not available. It is estimated that a married couple with two children on three quarters average earnings will pay approximately £700 a year in VAT in 1993-94 and £1,700 a year in VAT in 1993-94 at one-and-a-half times average earnings. Figures for VAT payments by such a family in earlier years, including 1978-79 have been deposited in the Library. Estimates of VAT payments are subject to wide margins of error.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the changes to the VAT system in each year since 1978-79, including both changes in the rate of VAT and changes in classification of goods and services.

Sir John Cope: On 18 June 1979 the standard rate of VAT of 8 per cent. and the higher rate of 12½ per cent. were unified at 15 per cent., which was raised to 17½ per cent. from 1 April 1991. A comprehensive list of all changes in the VAT system going back to 1978-79 could be made only at disproportionate cost, but the main changes to the VAT liability of goods and services have been the extension of the standard rate to:

—hot take away food from 1 May 1984;

—building alterations from 1 June 1984;

—the publication of advertisements in newspapers etc., from 1 May 1985;

—the construction and sale of new non-residential buildings from 1 April 1989; and —fuel and power supplied to business, and to water and sewerage supplied to manufacturing industry, from 1 July 1990.

Landlords were given the option to tax non-residential rents and sales of used buildings from 1 August 1989. Supplies of stockbroking services, which were previously standard rated, were made exempt from 1 January 1990.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his most recent estimate of how much VAT is paid per annum by (a) an average family and (b) a married couple on average income; and how much they paid in 1978-79.

Sir John Cope: It is estimated that a family consisting of a married couple on average earnings with two children will pay approximately £1,010 a year in VAT, and a couple with no children £980 a year in VAT in 1993-94. Comparable figures for the same family types for 1978-79 have been deposited in the Library. Estimates of VAT payments are subject to wide margins of error.

Exports

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total value of the United Kingdom's exports for each of the last four quarters.

Mr. Nelson: The latest information is available on the CSO database, which can be accessed through the House of Commons Library; the indentifier is DJAZ.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest quarterly figure he has for the total level of export orders; and what the total was for the same period last year.

Mr. Portillo: Quantitative data on the total level of export orders is not available.

Excise Duty

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue the Treasury has forgone since January in lost excise duty from the cross-border sales of (a) wines, (b) spirits, (c) beers, (d) cigarettes and tobacco and (e) all of (c) and (d).

Sir John Cope: The table shows the estimated total revenue losses, covering both excise duty and VAT, arising from increased cross-border shopping for the whole of 1993. It is not possible to give reliable estimates for different types of alcoholic drink. The estimates have been derived from the results of household surveys conducted by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. They take account of the fact that the some cross-border shopping took place before 1993, also that some of the purchases abroad are likely to represent new consumption, rather than substituting for purchases in the United Kingdom.

Revenue loss in 1993 (£m)

	Excise duty	VAT	Total
Alcoholic drinks	55	20	75
Tobacco products	80	20	100
Total	135	40	175

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the impact in 1994-95 on the retail prices index of raising £1 billion from (a) duty on tobacco products, (b) duty on beer, (c) duty on wine and spirits, (d) duty on petrol, (e) VAT and (f) vehicle excise duty.

Sir John Cope: The estimated impacts on the RPI excluding mortgage interest payments are as follows:

	Per cent.
Beer	0·29
Wine and spirits	0·90
Tobacco	0·41
Petrol	0·21
VED	0·22

These estimates assume that the increase in tax is fully passed on to consumers in the form of higher prices. The estimates allow for behavioural changes according to the procedure described in annex A to chapter 4 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1994-95." Increases in petrol duty and VED fall partly on business, so the long run RPI effect for these items is likely to be greater as businesses pass the additional tax on to consumers.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Nelson: Expenditure on press advertising by the Treasury is expected to be £57,000 in 1993-94. Expenditure in 1985-86 was £42,000. A comparable figure for 1979-80 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The Treasury does not have any expenditure on television and radio advertising.

International Monetary Fund

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all sources of British public funds allocated to the IMF in the last five years.

Mr. Nelson: The table summarises these transactions over the past five years:

£ million

	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93	1993-94
Quota[1]				1,104·3
ESAF[2]	17·0	1·5	1·5	10·0	20·0
Net SDR charges[3]	67·9	69·8	56·0	58·3	[5]58·2
Interest received on reserve tranche position[4]	33·3	27·8	27·3	22·2	[5]19·2

[1] As a member of the International Monetary Fund, the United Kingdom pays a subscription, its quota, which was last increased in 1992. 25 per cent. of this increase was paid in special drawing rights from holdings in the exchange equalisation account. This did not reduce the level of reserves as our reserve position with the fund—the amount the United Kingdom can draw on demand—was increased commensurately. The rest was paid from the National Loans Fund (NLF), in the form of sterling non-interest bearing notes which were placed on deposit at the Bank of England and returned to the NLF. These monetary transactions leave public expenditure and the PSBR unchanged.

[2] The United Kingdom makes an annual contribution to the interest subsidy account of the enhanced structural adjustment facility (ESAF), which is a trust fund administered by the IMF. This scores in the ODA's programme as public expenditure.

[3] There is a charge to pay on holdings by a member of special drawing rights. Interest is received by the member on its SDR holdings. As the United Kingdom currently holds fewer SDRs than its allocation, it makes a net payment to the fund from the exchange equalisation account which is recorded as a monetary transaction.

[4] The United Kingdom receives interest on its reserve tranche position in the IMF, when IMF holdings of sterling are less than the United Kingdom quota. If IMF holdings of sterling are greater than the UK quota, the United Kingdom is required to pay a charge via the exchange equalisation account. Transactions arising from the United Kingdom's reserve tranche position are monetary transactions that affect United Kingdom reserves.

[5] To end November 1993.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what criteria are used to determine whether or not an address is considered a person's main residence in relation to regulation 5(2) of the Income Tax (Interest Relief) (Housing Associations) Regulations 1988.

Mr. Dorrell: There is no statutory definition of the term "main residence". It is a question of fact whether a dwelling is a person's main residence, and the Inland Revenue apply the same criteria for the purposes of regulation 5 as they do for the purposes of the mortgage interest relief legislation generally.

Personal Pensions

Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when the Securities and Investments Board decided to review cases where personal pensions may have been mis-sold under the Financial Services Act 1986; how many cases are involved; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps the Securities and Investments Board proposes to take to ensure that any individual who was wrongly persuaded to buy a personal pension in contravention of the Securities and Investments Board rules and regulations is compensated in full.

Mr. Nelson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 8 December 1993 at column 234.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if the Securities and Investments Board will publish details of its survey of the sale of personal pensions; and in how many cases the Securities and Investments Board believes that there was prima facie evidence of mis-selling;

(2) if he will ask the Securities and Investments Board to publish the results of its examination of cases where personal pensions may have been mis-sold.

Mr. Nelson: The Securities and Investments Board will publish the results of its independent pilot study of pension transfers before Christmas. SIB is co-ordinating a full-scale study to establish the extent of mis-selling.

Financial Services Act

Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has to review the Financial Services Act 1986.

Mr. Nelson: I have no proposals to review the Financial Services Act 1986.

Departmental Spending Programme

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the change in the value of each departmental spending programme for 1994-95 measured by factor prices, where available, relative to 1993-94 outturn and 1992-93 figures.

Mr. Portillo: The information sought is not available. However, departmental spending figures were published in the November 1993 "Financial Statement and Budget Report" in cash and real terms in table 5B.3 and table 5B.4 respectively.

Finance Bill

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the date for the publication of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on 9 December at column 313.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Gennady Shtelman

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received on the case of Gennady Shtelman, a prisoner in Uzbekistan; and what action he has taken.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am aware of the case of Gennady Shtelman and have received a number of representations on his behalf.

During President Karimov's visit to London in November, I raised with him the importance of observing human rights, in line with his country's CSCE commitments and other international conventions. Mr. Shtelman's case was raised at official level. Our ambassador in Tashkent will continue to monitor his and other cases.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91; and how many vehicles were involved.

Mr. Goodlad: Official transport for Ministers was provided by the Government car service during 1990-91 at a cost of £328,050. Six vehicles were provided.

Gibraltar

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussion she has had with the Spanish Government about Gibraltar; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, met Señor Solana to discuss Gibraltar on 1 March. They discussed possible ways of developing the Brussels process and the way ahead generally. Since March officials have met three times, and a further meeting is planned for 14 December. My right hon. Friend hopes to have further discussions with Señor Solana in the early part of next year.

Manchester United Supporters

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, (1) pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, column 678, what response he received to his representations to the Turkish ambassador of 8 November concerning the treatment of Manchester United supporters;

(2) pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, column 678, whether the British ambassador in

Ankara has yet received a report, or other response to his representations to the Turkish authorities on the treatment of Manchester United supporters;

(3) pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, column 678, in respect of how many Manchester United supporters allegations of maltreatment were sent to the Turkish ambassador.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The British ambassador in Ankara has not yet received a response to his representations to the Turkish authorities.

The Turkish ambassador in London presented a report to us on 23 November. There was much in it to clarify about the treatment by the Turkish authorities of British football fans. On 2 December, we sent the ambassador a list of the 16 main allegations and asked for the Turkish authorities' comments.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many complaints have been received from the Turkish authorities relating to the treatment of Galatasaray supporters in Manchester.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No complaints have been received from the Turkish authorities about the treatment of Galatasaray supporters in Manchester.

European Union

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out each provision of each treaty which applies to the European Community pillar and each provision of each treaty which applies to (a) the European Union collectively and (b) to each of the other pillars of the Union.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As I made clear in my answer of 2 December at column 680, the Government use the terms European Community and European Union according to the subject matter under discussion. The treaty of Rome, the treaty of Paris and the EURATOM treaty, as amended by titles II, III and IV of the treaty on European Union apply to the "Community" pillar; title V of the Treaty on European Union applies to the CFSP pillar; title VI applies to the justice and home affairs pillar; and titles I and VII apply to the European Union collectively as well as to individual pillars. There are some cross-references to different pillars within each title.

Anguilla

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what stage he has reached in resolving the dispute between Anguilla and Her Majesty's Government regarding sovereignty, internal affairs, building of prisons and other matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There is no such dispute over sovereignty between Anguilla and Her Majesty's Government. We concluded a country policy plan with the Government of Anguilla in August 1993. The plan provides for a capital aid programme of £10·5 million over the next four years, including a new structure to replace the dilapidated prison.

Nuclear Non-proliferation

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effects on nuclear non-proliferation of the partial ratification in the Ukrainian Parliament of the START I treaty.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have made clear to the Ukrainian Government that we do not consider the resolution on ratification of START I by the Ukrainian Parliament to be acceptable. The Ukrainian Government, however, have confirmed that they remain committed to Ukrainian non-nuclear weapons status. We will continue to urge the Ukrainian Government to secure Ukraine's full implementation of the START I treaty, and accession to the non-proliferation treaty as a non-nuclear weapons state, without further delay.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the reasons for the Government of St. Helena excluding Mr. Timmreck from returning to the island in advance of any exclusion order being made.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This is a matter for the Government of St. Helena. It is in the hands of solicitors and is the subject of litigation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Occupational Pensions

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on occupational pensions specific to pension funds of public industries that have been privatised.

Mr. Hague: The pension schemes of former public industries operate within the same legal framework as all private sector schemes.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out the proposed full list of tests and points for assessing qualification for the categories of incapacity benefit.

Mr. Scott: The Government published a consultation document "A consultation on the medical assessment for incapacity benefit" on 1 December. This document, which is freely available, outlines the initial stages in the development of the proposed medical test and seeks comments on how incapacity for work is to be defined and scored. A copy has been placed in the Library. All comments are most welcome. The results of the consultation and an evaluation exercise will determine how the test is finally framed.

Personal Pensions

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to make personal pensions attractive across the age range; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: I have today published a consultation paper on age-related rebates. The results of this exercise will help to formulate our detailed policy proposals. Copies of the paper have been placed in the Library. The consultation period will end on 15 January 1994.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the result of the appeal hearing on 14 September attended by Mr. M., national insurance number RA 91 50 70 C, into his appeal against the decision of the Benefits Agency to refuse him mobility allowance; when Mr. M. will be notified of the decision on his appeal; and if he will make a statement on the interval between hearing and notification.

Mr. Scott: The responsibility for the administration of appeals is a matter for the president of the Independent Tribunal Service, his honour Judge Thorpe. He will write to the hon. Member.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what account the Child Support Agency takes of existing maintenance payment made in respect of families living outside Britain when assessing liability for maintenance payments.

Mr. Burt: The formula which the Child Support Agency uses to assess maintenance does not take account of other maintenance arrangements, whether or not they involve persons living abroad.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of the guidelines issued by his Department to Benefits Agency to advise their local offices on which categories of jobs might be suitable for disabled people in receipt of invalidity benefit; and what representations he has received in response.

Mr. Scott: Guidance issued to adjudication officers refers them to the "Standard Occupational Classification". This has been developed jointly by the Department of Employment and the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. Both the "Standard Occupational Classification" and "The Adjudication Officers Guide" are in the Library.

Girocheques

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many replacement girocheques were issued by his Department in each of the last five years; and what was their total value for each of these years;

(2) what changes there have been in the criteria used by his Department for the issuing of replacement girocheques;

(3) if he will make a statement about the criteria used by his Department for the issuing of replacement girocheques in cases where the original cheque has been lost or stolen; and if he will make a statement on what flexibility unemployment benefit offices have in administering this policy.

Mr. Hague: The administration of payment of benefit by girocheque is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 9 December 1993:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about replacement girocheques issued by the Department of Social Security.

The number of girocheques replaced after being reported missing or stolen, and the value of those replaced girocheques (based on average value of issues) in each of the last five years are as follows:

Year	Number replaced	Value £ million
1988-89	45,765	3·53
1989-90	53,636	4·31
1990-91	58,802	5·38
1991-92	67,265	6·47
1992-93	90,933	8·93

Additionally, the Employment Service Agency acts as our agent in the provision of girocheques to those who are unemployed and claiming Income Support. Data relevant to those issues cannot be seperately identified and are, therefore, not included in the tables above.

Since the formation of the Benefits Agency there has been no change in the criteria for the issuing of replacement girocheques.

I am informed by Mike Fogden, the Chief Executive of the Employment Service Agency that the criteria they use in the issuing of replacement girocheques is the same as that of the Benefits Agency, namely:

To issue a prompt replacement whenever a girocheque is reported as not received, lost, stolen or destroyed unless there is reason to doubt that the report is genuine.

The reasons for doubt include:

(a) an unreasonable delay in making the report.
(b) incomplete or inconsistent answers on the report form.
(c) Post Office confirmation that the girocheque has been cashed.
(d) a previous history of loses.

Decisions on replacing girocheques reported as lost or stolen are made by Executive Officers based in Employment Service Jobcentres or Benefit Agency offices, who take account of the individual circumstances of each case.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Disability

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about his Department's future plans for the disability living allowances Minister's hotline unit; and how many cases have been dealt with by the unit in each month since its establishment.

Mr. Scott: The administration of disability living allowance is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 9 December 1993.

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the Disability Living Allowance (DLA) Hotline.

The Hotline continues to operate at the DLA Unit in Blackpool and achieve a 48-hour call back service. There are presently no plans to alter this facility. However, as the performance for handling DLA claims is now being sustained at a high level we will have to consider at some point whether there remains a need for the service in the same form to be maintained in the future. Members will be advised of any changes if, and when we propose such changes.

As requested, I have provided details in the attached appendix of the number of cases that have been dealt with by the Ministers Hotline since its inception.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Fraud

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the basis of the calculation of sector fraud achievement of claimed savings of £491 million in weekly benefit and £25 million in instrument payment savings on page 15 of the document, "Fighting Fraud in 1992-93".

Mr. Hague: The administration of benefit fraud is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Bob Cryer, dated 9 November 1993:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the basis of sector fraud's savings as published in Fighting Fraud.

With regard to the weekly benefit saving, a multiplier of 32 weeks is applied to the amount of weekly benefit savings recorded as a result of successful fraud investigations or interventions. This single multiplier is currently applied to all benefits payable by the Department and reflects the anticipated average period for which claims could be expected to continue in the absence of a successful fraud intervention.

Instrument of Payment savings are not subject to any multiplier and all such savings are recorded at face value.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

SCOTLAND

Kilgarth Tip, Coatbridge

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to take a decision about the application by City of Glasgow district council in respect of Kilgarth tip, Coatbridge.

Mr. Lang: The letters conveying the decision about the application by City of Glasgow district council were issued on Monday 6 December.

Learning Difficulties

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what statutory provisions govern the voting rights of people with learning difficulties; what plans he has to ensure that people with learning disabilities are given better opportunities to vote; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The statutory provisions are contained in the representation of the people and the mental health legislation. To be entitled to vote all electors must satisfy criteria of eligibility and competence. Eligibility is governed by the registration process and it is the responsibility of electoral registration officers to determine whether or not an applicant satisfies the statutory conditions, including the common law requirement that an elector should not lack the capacity to vote because of profound learning difficulties. At an election the presiding officer also carries a responsibility to satisfy himself as to the elector's capacity to vote.

The Scottish Office Home and Health Department will shortly be issuing revised guidance on these matters to electoral registration officers.

Forestry

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the forestry review group's report.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 November 1993]: The advice of the review group is, and will remain, confidential to Ministers.

A7

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be in a position to publish the route action plan covering the A7 trunk route south of Hawick; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 29 November 1993]: I expect to publish a leaflet setting out the details of the route action plan early in 1994.

Set-aside Land

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what percentage of arable land on Scottish non-LFA farms will require to be taken out of production in 1994, on the basis of IACS figures, to avoid liability for penalties under the arable area payment scheme in 1995, showing (a) the standard set-aside requirement, (b) the penalty from 1993 and (c) any further area arising from the discrepancy between IACS statistics and previous census statistics submitted by the Department to the European Commission;

(2) if he will estimate the reduction in production of spring-sown cereals in 1994 arising from the arable area payments scheme penalty for 1993 and any further reduction in cropping that may be required to avoid a further penalty in 1995; and if he will make a statement on the impact of that reduction on the Scottish maltsters, millers and other cereal using industries.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 6 December 1993]: No arable land requires to be taken out of production in 1994 or 1995, nor is there a discrepancy in the statistics.

The rules of the arable area payments scheme made clear that the total claimed arable area must not exceed the regional base area; and that any excess would result in penalties. The scheme is voluntary; and if farmers do apply there is no obligation to do so on all their arable land. They may therefore sow as much arable crops as they wish without setting aside any land.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Fraud

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the sentences available for fraud.

Mr. Maclean: The Government are satisfied that the penalties for offences involving fraud are adequate. Fraudulent trading and false accounting both carry a maximum sentence of seven years' imprisonment; and obtaining property by deception has a maximum sentence of 10 years' imprisonment.

Prison Officers (Accommodation)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officer accommodation units at each of the London prisons were still owned by the Prison Department as of 1 December.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 10 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking how many prison officer's quarters were still owned by the Prison Service at each of the London prisons. The number as at 1 December 1993 were as follows:

	Number
Belmarsh	13
Brixton	120
Feltham	86
Holloway	150
Latchmere House	21
Pentonville	94
Wandsworth	114
Wormwood Scrubs	172
	770

Firearms Certificates

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in England and Wales had been granted a firearms certificate as of 1 December; and for what uses such certificates have been granted.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The number of firearms certificates which were on issue in England and Wales as at 31 December 1992 was 136,810. Corresponding information for 1 December 1993 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The law requires that, before issuing a firearm certificate, the chief officer of police must satisfy himself that the applicant has a good reason for requiring the firearm or ammunition in respect of which the certificate is sought. No central record is kept of the reasons for which certificates are granted.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce legislation on dangerous dogs in the coming Session.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None.

Farriers (Registration) Act 1975

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many communications he has received during the consultation on deregulation of the Farriers (Registration) Act 1975; how many were in favour and how many against; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Department has received 16 responses to its consultative letter concerning the deregulation review of the Farriers (Registration) Acts 1975 and 1977. Eleven were in favour of retaining the present controls and five argued for deregulation.

Riding Establishments Acts

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many communications he has received during the consultation on deregulation of the Riding Establishments Acts; how many were in favour and how many against; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Department has received 12 responses to its consultative letter on the deregulation review of the Riding Establishments Acts 1964 and 1970. All were in favour of retaining present controls.

Sentencing

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what account he takes, in reaching decisions on tariff sentences upon those convicted of offences deemed political, of the individual offenders and mitigating factors such as age or nature of motivation;

(2) what representations he has received from (a) Abdul Qayyum Raja, a prisoner at HMP Long Lartin, (b) his legal representatives and (c) other individuals and organisations about his case;

(3) if he will reduce the sentence imposed under tariff arrangements on Abdul Qayyum Raja; when he intends to announce his decision in this case; and if he will disclose full information and explanation for the tariff sentence he finally decides upon in this case;

(4) what representations he has received from (a) Mohammed Riaz, a prisoner at HMP Whitemoor, (b) his legal representatives and (c) other individuals and organisations on his case;

(5) if he will reduce the sentence imposed under the tariff arrangements on Mohammed Riaz; when he intends to announce his decision in this case; and if he will disclose full information and explanation for the tariff sentence he finally decides upon in his case;

(6) if he will disclose full information about each factor which he takes into account in reaching decisions concerning the tariff; and if he will make a statement on the effect of the judgment in the House of Lords in the case of Doody and Others in 1993.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The arrangements for determining the period which mandatory life sentence prisoners—including those convicted of politically motivated murders—should serve in custody in order to meet the requirements of retribution and deterrence are set out in my right hon. and learned Friend's replies of 27 July 1993 at columns 863-85 and 4 November 1993 at columns 376-78. The procedures for disclosing such decisions and related information to the prisoners concerned are also described.

In deciding the period to be served in custody all available information, including advice from the judiciary, representations on the prisoners' behalf and any mitigating factors will be fully taken into account. The statement by the right hon. Sir Leon Brittan, as Secretary of State in 1983, that terrorists and certain other specified categories of murderer can normally expect to serve at least 20 years will also be relevant in some cases.

As to the cases of Mr. Raja and Mr. Riaz, representations have been made on their behalf by their legal representatives, Members of both Houses of Parliament and members of the public. Mr. Riaz has also made representations direct. All these representations are being carefully considered and decisions will be taken shortly. Mr. Raja and Mr. Riaz will be informed separately of the period set in their case and each of them will be given reasons for the decision.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received supporting the view that tariff sentences should be set by the trial judge in open court upon hearing representations on behalf of the prisoner immediately upon conviction.

Mr. Maclean: From time to time, we receive representations supporting the view that when a mandatory life sentence is passed on a person convicted of the offence of murder the period necessary to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence should be stated by the trial judge in open court after the offender has had an opportunity to make representations.

Custody Costs

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average cost of custody per inmate month in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Alun Michael, dated 10 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the cost of custody per inmate month.

The average monthly cost of holding an inmate in custody was £2,142 for 1992-93.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average monthly cost of a supervision order combined with intensive intermediate treatment or specified activities in the last year for which figures are available;

(2) what was the average monthly cost of a probation order in the last year for which figures are available;

(3) what was the average monthly cost of a community service order in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Maclean: The latest information on the costs of probation and community service orders is set out in table 12.3 of "Probation Statistics, England and Wales, 1992", which is in the Library of the House.

The average monthly cost of a probation order is estimated at £98 and the average monthly cost of a community service order is estimated at £95. The costs of supervision orders when combined with other requirements may vary greatly and the equivalent figures could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average cost of custody per inmate month in (a) open and (b) closed youth establishments in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Alun Michael, dated 10 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the cost of custody per inmate month in open and closed youth establishments.

In 1992-93 the average monthly cost of holding an inmate in an open youth establishment and a closed youth establishment was £2,747 and £2,132 respectively.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average monthly cost of cautioning-plus schemes in the last year for which figures are available;

(2) what was the average cost of administering a caution in the last year in which figures are available.

Mr. Maclean: No figures are available on the cost of administering a caution. Although it is not possible to calculate the average monthly cost of so called "caution-plus" schemes, information from two long established schemes suggests that the average cost of each supported caution is in the range £300-£1,100.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average monthly cost of bail support schemes in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Maclean: The Home Office probation supervision grant scheme currently makes grants to 11 projects solely or mainly for bail support; other projects may include some bail support work.

The average monthly Home Office grant to these bail support projects in the financial year 1993-94 is £4,062. However, this may not fully reflect the cost of bail support projects as projects may well receive funding from other sources.

Security Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what checks his Department makes to ensure that security firms used by his Department do not employ staff who have criminal records.

Mr. Maclean: Staff from security firms employed by the Home Office undergo security checks, including criminal record checks, appropriate to the nature of their work and place of employment.

Winston Silcott

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to be able to take a decision in respect of the reference of the case of Winston Silcott to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to be in a position to reach a decision shortly.

Murder Sentences

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the shortest sentence served for murder in the last 30 years; and what were the circumstances.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Barbara Roche, dated 10 December 1993:

Shortest sentence served for murder in the last 30 years

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the shortest sentence served for murder in the last 30 years and what the circumstances were.

The shortest sentence served was one day. This occurred in two unrelated cases where the inmates died one day after reception.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average sentence served by those convicted of murder and later released.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 10 December 1993:

Average sentence length for murder

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the average time served by inmates sentenced for murder and who have since been released.

I attach a copy of a table showing the numbers of life sentenced prisoners released from 1981-91. This information is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales" (Table 8.5 of the latest volume, for 1991, CM 2157), a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what assessment he has made of the findings of the independent inquiry into the mandatory life sentence chaired by Lord Lane; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment he has made of the effect on victims and their families of knowing the sentence imposed on those convicted of murder, as recommended in the independent inquiry into the mandatory life sentence chaired by Lord Lane.

Mr. Maclean: I consider that the report of the Committee on the Penalty for Murder has usefully drawn together the arguments for a change in the existing law under which the mandatory penalty for murder is a sentence of life imprisonment. In considering the report's conclusions, I will, of course, take into account the possible effects of any change on the families of murder vicitims. But I have not been persuaded by arguments I have so far heard that any change is necessary to the present law.

Banking Services (Sundays)

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to provide that the services provided by bank and building societies to individuals such as automatic cash dispensers, telephone banking and cash and credit card transactions should be restricted on Sundays; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None. The Sunday Trading Bill contained on introduction three options for reform of the Sunday trading laws in England and Wales. A Committee of the whole House on 8 December chose the option of partial deregulation. If it becomes law this option would place no restriction on services provided by banks and building societies.

Deportation Policies

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will annouce the outcome of his internal review of deportation policies and procedures following the death of Joy Gardner; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I had hoped to be able to announce the outcome of the review before the House rises, but the review is not yet quite complete. I shall make an announcement as soon as possible after the recess.

Voluntary Repatriation

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many inquiries have been received about voluntary repatriation schemes established under section 29 of the Immigration Act 1971, in the past quarter and the same quarter last year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The voluntary repatriation scheme established under section 29 of the Immigration Act 1971 is operated by the International Social Service of the United Kingdom (ISS) on behalf of the Home Office. In the quarter 1 September to 30 November 1993 a total of 103 inquiries about voluntary repatriation were received by ISS; 43 such inquiries were received in the same quarter last year.

Immigration Advisory Service

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the criteria for the appointment of the directors of the organisation formerly known as UKIAS; how many candidates applied; how many (a) black and (b) Asian people were on the shortlist; what were the names of those who interviewed the candidates; and what are the salary and conditions of appointment of the successful candidate.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The appointment was a matter for the trustees of UKIAS's successor body, the immigration appeals advisory service, which is an independent body.

Prison Rules

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his proposed changes to the prison rules.

Mr. Howard: I have laid prison and young offender institution amendment rules before Parliament to come into effect on 1 January 1994. First, the rules will extend the scope of confidentiality for prisoners' legal correspondence to all correspondence between prisoners and their legal advisers or a court, whether or not legal proceedings have been commenced. The rules set out the circumstances in which such correspondence may be opened, read or stopped. Secondly, the amendments will increase the maximum period of cellular confinement a governor may impose as a disciplinary punishment from three to 14 days for adult prisoners and from three to seven days for young offenders. This is a desirable strengthening in disciplinary powers, particularly in the light of the continuing trend in increased offending in prisons.

DEFENCE

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of people employed (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

Mr. Aitken: The following table sets out, by grade, the total number of staff serving in my Department and the total number of black and Asian staff who have responded to the Department's ethnic minority origin survey. Response to the survey was voluntary, and where there are fewer than 10 ethnic minority staff listed in a particular grade, for reasons of personal confidentiality it is not our policy to define precise numbers.

Departmental Objectives

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list his departmental standing objectives.

Mr. Hanley: The current departmental standing objectives have been listed on page 2 of the MOD "Departmental Report 1993"—Cm 2201—a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether quantitative data are used in his assessment of the achievement of departmental standing objectives.

Mr. Hanley: Performance against departmental standing objectives is assessed on the basis of quantitative data where available and the judgment of military and civilian budget holders reports up the management chain.

Performance Targets

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what performance targets have been established in his Department.

Mr. Hanley: Performance targets have been set at all levels in the Department, both in the management plans which set out what budget holders undertake to deliver for their delegated budgets and in job plans for individuals. They could be collated centrally only at disproportionate cost.

Equipment

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what criteria are used to determine the figures provided in table 8, page 18 of Cm. 2201, relating to availability, reliability and maintainability of equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: Table 8 on page 18 of Cm 2201 gives figures for the percentage by value of contracts for new equipment projects over £1 million which have provisions for availability, reliability and maintainability. The criteria used to determine the figures are that reliability and maintainability requirements should form essential elements of the contract specification, wherever possible linking payment to the demonstration of satisfactory reliability and maintainability in service. Alternative approaches, including warranties and fixed-price support contracts are used where linkage of payment to demonstration is not practicable.

Chief of the Air Staff

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 6 December, Official Report, columns 54-55, what is the number of occasions in each of the last 12 months on which the Chief of the Air Staff has given a personal briefing to (a) hon. Members, (b) academics and (c) members of the media; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Briefings by the Chief of the Air Staff were given as follows:

	MPs	Academics	Media
January	—	—	—
February	—	—	4
March	1	—	3
April	—	—	—
May	1	—	—
June	—	—	—
July	—	—	—
August	—	—	1
September	—	—	—
October	1	—	—
November	—	—	—
December	—	—	—

Mr. David Hart

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 6 December, Official Report, columns 54-55, whether Mr. David Hart was given a briefing by the Chief of the Air Staff as (a) an academic or (b) a member of the media; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Mr. David Hart was briefed on 27 May by Air Officer Commanding-in-Chief RAF Strike Command because he had published media articles on general defence issues and one particularly about the RAF.

Maralinga

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the ex-gratia payment towards the clean-up of the Maralinga site will be made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley [pursuant to his answer, 1 December 1993, column 609]: The United Kingdom Government agreed in principle on 14 July to make an ex gratia payment of £20,000,000 to the Federal Government of Australia as a contribution to the cost of the further clean-up of the Maralinga site. A note giving effect to this agreement was signed today by the Australian High Commissioner and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office. A copy of the note will be placed in the Library of the House. The payment will be phased over six years beginning on 1 January 1994.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Copyright Libraries

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the copyright libraries entitled to a copy of all books published within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sproat: Under the Copyright Act 1911 publishers are required to deliver, at their own expense, a copy of any new publication to the British library. There are five other copyright libraries: the national libraries of Scotland and Wales; the Bodleian library, Oxford; Cambridge University library; and the library of Trinity college, Dublin. If any of them requests a copy the Copyright Licensing Agency may demand a free copy from the publisher on its behalf.

Overseas Artifacts

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which artifacts and from which countries, previously held in Britain, have been returned to their countries of origin in the last 10 years; what requests (a) have been rejected and (b) are currently under consideration; and what is the value of the artifacts concerned.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not available centrally. The artifacts in question are the property of independent institutions and private owners and any requests for their return would normally be directed to them. The Government are not necessarily informed of such requests or their outcome. Even when we have been made aware of requests, the information required could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Laboratories

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many whole-time equivalent staff are currently employed at (a) the Warren Spring Laboratory, (b) the National Engineering Laboratory and (c) the National Physical Laboratory; how many were employed at each laboratory on 31 March 1992 and 31 March 1993; and how many he plans to employ on 31 March 1994.

Mr. Heseltine: The numbers for 31 March 1992 and 1993 and currently are:

	31 March 1992	31 March 1993	Current
Warren Spring Laboratory	321·0	278·0	224·5
National Engineering Laboratory	388·5	363·5	338·0
National Physical Laboratory	807·5	770·0	748·0

Warren Spring Laboratory will be closing on 31 March to be replaced by the new National Environmental Technology Centre, to which a substantial number of its staff will be transferring.

I am currently considering future plans for the other laboratories.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many staff at Warren Spring he presently proposes to transfer to AEA Technology; and which sections, teams or project groups have been named for closure since 1 April.

Mr. McLoughlin: The House is aware that the National Environmental Technology Centre is being created in south Oxfordshire by the bringing together of Warren Spring Laboratory with the environmental technology services of the Atomic Energy Authority. This merger of the country's two major environmental research laboratories will form a single powerful centre of excellence in this field. The merger will take place on 1 April 1994. The turnover of the NETC will be about £20 million to £25 million, compared with £13·5 million at Warren Spring in 1992-93.

The merger will take place in most of the business centres of Warren Spring, accounting for 87 per cent. of the laboratory's work in 1992-93. All the scientific staff working in those business centres have been offered the opportunity to transfer. The numbers finally deciding to transfer from Warren Spring will depend on individual choice, but about 100 are expected to do so.

The business centres which the AEA has decided not to transfer, and which will therefore close on or before 1 April 1994, are:

Heavy Gas Dispersion,
Environmental Advisory Unit
Thermal Processing
Chemical Analysis—quality assurance, inorganic analysis, dispersant evaluation
Effluent treatment—mineral processing
Information systems
Ship Safety
Process Technology—solid/liquid separation

These account for 38 scientific staff. Support activities which will also close are:

Directorate and senior management team
Central services
Finance
Personnel
Technical services
Publications, photography and library.

Technology Transfer

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received on the DTI funding mechanisms for technology transfer; and when he expects such mechanisms to be in place.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Government received around 800 representations during the preparation of the White Paper on Science and Technology—"Realising our Potential—A Strategy for Science Engineering and Technology" Cm. 2250. Following publication, I am using seminars to consult industry on the implementation of the new policies.

These consultations are showing that in addition to the range of current technology transfer initiatives, there is scope for further activity, particularly involved business links to provide local delivery. Consultations are in progress on those new ideas, and announcements for pilots are likely in 1994.

Research and Development

Mr. Rendel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) how much he expects his Department to spend on research and development for each year from 1993 to 1997;

(2) how much his Department spent on research and development in each year since 1980.

Mr. Heseltine: The Department of Trade and Industry's expenditure on research and development is recorded in the annual review of Government-funded research and development, copies of which are placed in the Library of the House. The first such review, published in 1983, shows expenditure from 1977-78 onwards. The 1993 review shows planned expenditure up to 1995-96. Revised figures, including plans for 1996-97, will be prepared in light of this year's public expenditure survey and published in the 1994 "Forward Look of Science and Technology", which replaces the annual review.

Trading Standards Officers

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, how many trading standards officers there are in non-metropolitan areas of England.

Mr. McLoughlin: There are about 796 qualified trading standards officers in post in England local authorities other than the London and Metropolitan boroughs.

Peat

Mr. Canavan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what funds have been made available to support research into the development and promotion of alternatives to peat; and if he will list the companies, institutes and research establishments which have been supported by these funds.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department promotes the recyling of waste material, including the composting of its degradable fraction, and has recently funded two projects under DEMOS, the DTI's environmental management options scheme, providing:

(i) A grant of over £400,000 to South West Water, Devon Waste Management and Focsa Services (UK) Ltd., to demonstrate the feasibility of co-composting of Municipal Solid Waste and Sewage Sludge.
(ii) A grant of over £150,000 to Motherwell Bridge Envirotec, Environmental Energy and Newcastle university to demonstrate an anaerobic digestion plant for the treatment of the organic fraction of municipal solid waste.

My Department is also seeking to overcome a major obstacle to increased use of composted materials—the lack of recognised standards—by funding a specialist from Warren Spring laboratory to participate in CEN work to develop European standards for soil conditioners and growing media.

All this work has the potential to result in the development of composted materials which could serve as alternatives to peat.

I should add that the Department of the Environment has the lead on research into composting techniques in the context of waste management, and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food also supports some research into growing media.

Textiles

Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the Government's policy with regard to the multi-fibre arrangement in the event of the Uruguay round of the GATT not achieving adequate cuts in the high tariff and non-tariff barriers faced by British textile and clothing manufacturers in United Kingdom export markets in the third world and in the emerging economies of the developing world.

Mr. Needham: The Government are working for a balanced outcome to the Uruguay round negotiations as they affect the textile and clothing sector. We have been pressing in particular for a satisfactory outcome reducing tariff and non-tariff barriers as part of an overall settlement including the phase-out of the multi-fibre arrangement and strengthened GATT rules and disciplines.

Ferranti

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information his Department holds on the trading activities of International Signal and Control from 1971 to its purchase by Ferranti in 1987.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The Department does not monitor the commercial operations of international organisations, and the information it holds on the trading activities of International Signal and Control Group plc prior to its purchase by Ferranti plc in 1987 is that generally addressed to Ferranti shareholders in a circular dated 29 September 1989 from the chairman of that company.

Ferranti subsequently provided additional information direct to the Serious Fraud Office, which conducted an investigation into the matters of concern outlined by the company.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what communication his Department has had with the office of defence trade control at the United States state department in regard to the collapse of Ferranti.

Mr. Needham: None.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his Department took any action to block a bid by Thomson CSF for the Ferranti company.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Neither my Department, nor the Office of Fair Trading, was made aware of any proposal by Thomson CSF to bid for Ferranti International.

Manufacturing

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a table revising and updating table 2, "Large Fast Growing Sectors", in the world market economies published in 1989 in his Department's report on manufacturing into the late 1990s.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information requested is in the table.

Fireworks

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to review the deregulation of industry, with particular reference to the manufacture of fireworks.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: All regulations having an impact on business are under review as part of a Government-wide initiative to minimise regulatory burdens on business whilst maintaining effective and appropriate safeguards. The manufacture of fireworks is covered by the Explosives Act 1875, which is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. I understand that the Act is currently under review by the Health and Safety Executive, in consultation with interested parties.

Konver Programme

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list, by region, (a) the successful bids and their value and (b) the unsuccessful bids for Konver funding.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 8 December 1993]: Lists of both successful and unsuccessful applicants for Konver, European regional development fund and European social fund grants have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The total number of applications was 289. Following the amalgamation of certain projects the total number of applications assessed was 263.

Data Rights

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to introduce data rights for research in the United Kingdom, equivalent to those made available by NASA and the Government of Japan.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 8 December 1993]: In relation to earth observation satellites, access for researchers at reasonable cost to data resulting from European Space Agency missions is guaranteed by the agency, of which the United Kingdom is a member. In addition, the British National Space Centre is participating in international negotiations to provide for the exchange of data for research purposes between European and non-European missions.

Post Office Finance

Mr. Hain: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the difference between the planned external finance requirements of the Post Office for 1994-95 in the Financial Statement and Budget report of the previously announced figure; and what part of it represents proceeds from the proposed sale of Parcelforce as mentioned in paragraph 5.42 of the Financial Statement.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 9 December 1993]: The 1994-95 external financing limit for the Post Office was set at –£186 million in the 1992 autumn statement. This figure has been revised to –£226 million in the 1993 "Financial Statement and Budget Report." None of this increase represents proceeds from the proposed sale of Parcelforce.

Bananas

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement on the dispute between Geest and Fyffes and Jamaican Producers regarding banana licences and transportation arrangements.

Mr. Jack: Under the new EC banana regime, which came into force on 1 July 1993, the issuing of licences to import bananas into the Community to companies who apply in the United Kingdom is the responsibility of the Intervention Board executive agency. The board's officials have issued licences for the second half of this year entirely in accordance with the provisions of Council Regulation 404/93 and Commission Regulations 1442/93 and 1443/93. The dispute over licences between Geest and Fyffes and Jamaica Producers is a commercial matter which it is for the companies themselves to resolve.

Beef Premium Payments

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how long farmers in (a) England and (b) Wales had to wait on average for payment of beef premium payments; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The EC rules do not allow beef premium payments until 1 November, when a 60 per cent. advance can be made. In England, payments under the beef special premium scheme began in November, and by 8 December, some 40 per cent. of claimants had been paid advances. In Wales, advance payments are expected to begin by early January at the very latest. In both England and Wales, advance payments under the suckler cow premium scheme are expected to start in January.

Mr. Hicks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when farmers in south-east Cornwall can expect to receive the initial payment of their special beef premium; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The EC rules do not allow advance payments of beef special premium to be made before 1 November. By 8 December, some 40 per cent. of claimants in England had been paid advances. In Devon and Cornwall, the proportion of claimants paid by 8 December was 43 per cent. which was more than the average. Remaining claimants will be paid as quickly as possible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Surveillance

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if citizens making their houses available to the police for surveillance are individually identified in court.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Where there is a prosecution in a case in which individuals have assisted the police by making their houses available for the purpose of surveillance it is open to the prosecution to apply to the court before trial for a ruling that this fact should not be disclosed to the defence. The court's duty is then to balance the public interest of non-disclosure against the interest of securing fairness to the defendant. If the court decides against disclosure the identity of the house occupier would not then be revealed in court. If an order for disclosure is made it is open to the prosecution to abandon the case.

Leave to Enter

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people arriving on a cross-channel ferry have been refused leave to enter the United Kingdom and removed each month since May at (a) Dover western docks, (b) Dover eastern docks, (c) Folkestone, (d) Ramsgate and (e) Newhaven.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is given in the table.

Prisoner Discharges

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the money allowance-grant that is given to a prison inmate who is discharged from a prison in England and Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 13 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the grant paid to prisoners discharged from prisons in England and Wales.

Most prisoners serving sentences over 14 days are eligible for a discharge grant. Exceptions include those with substantial resources or discharged to hospital. The rate of the grant generally corresponds to one week's Income Support and is currently £44·00 (age 25 and over) or £34·55 (age 18 to 24). Prisoners who need accommodation arranged for them on release are eligible for a higher rate, currently £90·05.

Prisoners (except deportees) not eligible for a discharge grant receive payment of fares and a subsistence allowance to cover their journey to a destination in the British Isles.

Deportations

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been deported, so far, in 1993; and how many people were deported from the United Kingdom in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The number of persons removed from the United Kingdom under the deportation process was 2,220 in 1991, 2,453 in 1992, and 1,654—provisional figure—for January to September 1993.

Requirement to Leave

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many nationals of EC countries were made subject to a requirement to leave the United Kingdom for (a) each of the three years preceding 1993 and (b) for each month since May 1993.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information available is given in the table.

Life Sentences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average life sentence served by (a) men and (b) women who were sentenced to life imprisonment since 1970.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 13 December 1993:

AVERAGE TIME SERVED BY LIFE SENTENCE PRISONERS SENTENCED SINCE 1970

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the average time served by (a) men and (b) women sentenced to life imprisonment since 1970.

The available information is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales" (Tables 8.4 and 8.5 of the latest volume, for 1991, Cm. 2157), a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library. Information for men and women released in 1992 was given in response to a question from Mrs. Mahon MP (Vol. 229, Col. 856, Written Answers on 27 July 1993) and I attach a copy of the reply for ease of reference.

Shotguns

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a table showing the major occupation of shotgun certificate holders.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not available centrally.

Firearms

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many firearms, by category, are registered as being in private ownership.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The estimated number of firearms which were held on a firearm certificate in England and Wales on 31 December 1992 is 358,000. Information as to the categories of firearms held on certificate is not available centrally.

Baroness Thatcher

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those police authorities which have asked publisher Harper Collins for a contribution to the cost of policing visits made by Baroness Thatcher to promote her memoirs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not held centrally.

New Prisons

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list any sites being considered for new prisons in south Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Alex Carlile, dated 13 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the sites being considered for new prisons in South Wales.

Long term projections of prison population indicate that 800 additional prisoner places will be required in South Wales by the end of the decade. A new prison is needed, therefore, which will provide relief for Cardiff and Swansea prisons and reduce the need to send many prisoners from this area to other prisons, sometimes as far as Dartmoor and The Verne in Dorset. The Prison Service recognises that it should, wherever possible, hold prisoners close to their homes. A new prison in South Wales is vital to this key long-term objective.

A search was undertaken to find a suitable site for a new prison in South Wales. In addition to being of an adequate size and shape, together with suitable ground conditions for substantial buildings, it had to be well located in terms of the distribution of population, access to the major road and motorway system in South Wales and public transport. The Parc Hospital site at Bridgend was identified as an ideal location and will be available for use later next year. The purchase of the site is being negotiated and a planning notice for the proposed prison has been served in compliance with Welsh Office Circular 37/84. This is now being considered by the local planning authority, Ogwr Borough Council.

Prisoners (Benefits)

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provisions are made for prisoners to apply for social security benefits before release, to enable any such benefits to be received immediately upon release; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 13 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking what provisions are made for prisoners to apply for social security benefits before release.

Governors are encouraged to ensure that, whenever possible, prisoners are given the opportunity prior to discharge to seek advice about their entitlement to social security benefits on release. There are no arrangements for prisoners to make a claim while still in custody. Prisoners are advised to visit their local benefits office as soon as possible after release. They are provided with a form to introduce them to the Department of Social Security. Many qualify for a discharge grant, which provides financial assistance until they are able to lodge a claim.

Guidance on benefits is given in the Prisoners Information Pack, which is available to all prisoners. The Prison Service are currently considering with the Benefits Agency whether the arrangements for providing advice to prisoners on benefits to which they may properly be entitled on release can be improved.

Murder

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of individuals convicted for murder since the abolition of the death sentence who, on release, have committed murder again.

Mr. Maclean: From the information to date seven individuals convicted of murder in England and Wales since the abolition of the death penalty had been convicted again of murder in England and Wales following release as follows:

Case	Date of first murder	Date of second murder
First	1969	1986
Second	1971	1990
Third	1972	1988
Fourth	1972	1992
Fifth	1974	1985
Sixth	1979	1989
Seventh	1980	1992

In addition, a further case involved a murder in England in 1972, with a subsequent murder taking place in Scotland in 1983. One person convicted of a murder which took place in 1981 in Northern Ireland was subsequently convicted of a second murder in England which took place in 1992.

Inquests (Multiple Deaths)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what circumstances a coroner may adjourn an inquest into multiple deaths without reconvening its sitting to complete his investigations.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Under section 16(1) of the Coroners Act 1988, if a coroner is informed that a person has been charged with the murder, manslaughter or infanticide of the deceased, or with an offence directly involving or alleged to have been committed in circumstances connected with the death of the deceased, he must, in the absence of reason to the contrary, adjourn the inquest until after the conclusion of the relevant criminal proceedings. Under section 16(3) of the Act, the coroner may resume the adjourned inquest after the conclusion of the criminal proceedings if, in his opinion, there is sufficient cause to do so.

Electoral Boundaries

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to respond to the final suggestions for boundaries made by the European Parliamentary Committee for Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend will pay prompt attention to the report of the Committee when he receives it. I understand that that is likely to be later this month.

Police Statistics

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each police authority in England and Wales, (a) the increase in authorised police establishment requested and (b) the increase granted by him in each of the past five years, in both cases making it clear whether supernumeraries are included or excluded from each figure.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I will write to the hon. Member.

National Public Alert System

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce a national public alert system.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It was announced on 12 November 1992 that the obsolescent national siren warning system was to be closed down and that future national arrangements for warning the public would use radio and television broadcasts. Work is in hand on the new system.

Re-entry Visas

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the Government's policy on issuing re-entry visas to those settled in the United Kingdom and who intend to return within short periods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Re-entry visas were abolished in May 1991. Those settled in the United Kingdom are however exempt from the requirement to obtain a visa if they return to the United Kingdom for settlement within two years of departure.

PRIME MINISTER

European Union

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government in respect of the admission of states in the Visegrad group into the European Union; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Copenhagen European Council agreed in June that the Central European associate countries—including the four states in the Visegrad group—should be admitted to the European Union, if they so wished, as soon as they are ready to take on the obligations of membership. The Government had worked hard to achieve this outcome, and warmly welcomed it.

The associate countries are now beginning to prepare themselves, economically and politically. The United Kingdom is helping this process both bilaterally and through the European Union.

Honours System

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the progress of his proposals for the honours system announced on 4 March.

The Prime Minister: The changes to the honours system outlined in my statement to the House on 4 March have been put into effect. I plan to report to the House shortly on the review of the numbers and distribution of honours.

Northern Ireland (Investment)

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the companies from other EC countries which have brought inward investment into Great Britain and Northern Ireland in the last 10 years.

The Prime Minister: According to records maintained by the Department of Trade and Industry's Invest in Britain Bureau, 879 EC-owned companies have set up in the United Kingdom in the last 10 years. These figures are based on information provided by the companies at the time of the announcement to invest. There is no requirement to notify the Department, and so the figures include only those projects where the Invest in Britain Bureau and its regional partners were involved, or which have come to their notice. They take no account of subsequent developments.

At the request of the companies concerned, some names are commercially confidential, and cannot be quoted. However, a list of quotable companies has been placed in the Library of the House.

Cash Limits

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Prime Minister what will be the cash limit on the cost of running his office in 1994-95.

The Prime Minister: Financial provision for the running of my Office in 1994-95 is subject to the budgetary planning arrangements operated jointly by the Cabinet Office and Office of Public Service and Science. Internal allocation of the 1993 survey settlement is not yet complete. Provision is expected to be similar to that for the current financial year.

Special Advisers

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister what information ministerial special advisers who resign or retire are required to provide concerning their subsequent employment; and to whom.

The Prime Minister: None.

NATO

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister if it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government to support the admission of states in the Visegrad group into membership of NATO; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We and our NATO allies have repeatedly stated that NATO is not a closed shop. We do not therefore rule out the possibility of new members at some time in the future. But the question of NATO enlargement is a complex one. Our overriding objective in considering it must be to enhance security and stability across the whole of Europe, while at the same time ensuring that we do not create new divisions or erect new barriers.

Morality

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Prime Minister which of Her Majesty's Government's policies since 1979 have attempted to influence moral behaviour; and what assessment he has made of each of those policies.

The Prime Minister: Policies are designed to influence moral behaviour where it is in the national interest that they should do so. Our policies on law and order are perhaps the most obvious example.

No. 10 Downing Street

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister how much has been spent on decorating and furnishing No. 10 Downing street since November 1990.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 30 November 1993]: Figures are available only on a financial year basis. The expenditure on new works, furniture and fittings in the state rooms, on the catering facilities, and in the offices and other rooms in 10 Downing street from April 1991 to March 1993 was £292,000.

EDUCATION

Assisted Places

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, pursuant to his answer of 6 December, Official Report, column 31, what information his Department has on the place of residence of pupils under the assisted places scheme at the time of their original application for an assisted place; what steps his Department takes to ensure that applicants for assisted places are genuinely entitled to a place under the scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: Information about the place of residence of pupils at the time of their application for an assisted place is not held by the Department. It is for participating schools themselves to select pupils for assisted places, but the Department ensures that they target able children from families with low incomes, and also that a substantial majority of assisted pupils in any school have previously attended a maintained school.

To ensure that participating schools carry out assessments of income correctly, the Department also issues regular comprehensive guidance and carries out random audit surveys of income assessments. These surveys, together with the statistical information collected, show that schools are indeed administering the scheme properly and targeting the pupils for whom the scheme is intended.

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, pursuant to his answer of 6 December, Official Report, column 31, what was the total cost to public funds of the assisted places scheme at Wolverhampton grammar school in each year since 1981.

Mr. Forth: The information requested for the past five years is given in the table. Data for earlier years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Academic year	DFE expenditure £000s
1988-89	485
1989-90	507
1990-91	600
1991-92	702
1992-93	[1]760

[1] Estimate pending final claim.

School Inspectors

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) if he will list by local education authority area (a) the number of Office for Standards in Education formal inspections and (b) the number of unannounced visits carried out so far.

(2) if he will list by local education authority area the number of formal inspections planned till the end of 1994.

Mr. Robin Squire: The arrangements for inspecting schools under the Education (Schools) Act 1992 are a matter for Ofsted.

I have asked Professor Sutherland to write to the hon. Member.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91; and how many vehicles were involved.

Mr. Forth: In the financial year 1990-91, the Government car service for Ministers cost the Department £134,191·00, including value added tax, for five vehicles. There will in addition have been a cost to the Department in transporting ministerial boxes and other papers to Ministers; it is unfortunately not possible to disaggregate this figure from other costs.

ENVIRONMENT

Homelessness

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many hostel spaces for the homeless in Doncaster have been supported by his Department in (a) 1990-91, (b) 1991-92, (c) 1992-93 and (d) the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The Government provide resources, through the programmes of the Housing Corporation, for capital and revenue funding towards housing associations schemes for people with special needs. The information which follows gives the number of bed-spaces in such schemes in the metropolitan borough of Doncaster which have received revenue funding for that year and the amount of capital funding which has contributed to the addition of new bed-spaces in that year.

	Bed-spaces	Revenue funding £	Capital funding £
1990-91	37	92,000	206,000
1991-92	43	137,000	128,000
1992-93	54	144,000	382,000
1993-94	58	158,000	116,000

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of hostel accommodation beds available for elderly homeless people at risk in central London in November 1991, November 1992 and November 1993.

Sir George Young: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, what discussions he has held regarding provision to replace the beds for the homeless lost in Central London on the closure of the Salvation Army hostel in Great Peter street.

Sir George Young: The responsibility for the funding of new provision through housing associations is vested in the Housing Corporation, which I understand has had discussions with the Salvation Army about the future of the Great Peter street site. More generally, under the Government's rough sleepers initiative, the Housing Corporation is planning to provide funding for about 1,500 new bedspaces in Central London over a three-year period beginning this year.

Ministers (Foreign Visits)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the Ministers in his Department who since June 1987 have visited (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Malaysia, (c) Singapore and (d) South Africa on official business; and which such visits included party political activities in addition to official duties.

Mr. Gummer: My Department's central records, which only go back to 1 April 1990, show that the only such visits were by my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) to Malaysia and Lord Strathclyde to South Africa.

As far as I am aware these visits included no party political activities. The visit to Malaysia was to attend a meeting with developing countries prior to the UNCED summit in Rio de Janeiro, whilst Lord Strathclyde's visit to South Africa was to promote export opportunities for the United Kingdom water industry.

Sustainable Development

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has received on the matters discussed and decisions taken at the workshop on national plans for sustainable development held by the Development Assistance and Environmental Policies Committees of the OECD in Ottawa in October.

Mr. Yeo: The workshop was attended by representatives of OECD and other Governments, including officials from my Department and the Overseas Development Administration, and by non-governmental organisations (notably the UK-based International Institute for Environment and Development and the Overseas Development Institute) and by international agencies.

It was not a decision-taking forum. It compared the experience of different OECD countries (a) in preparing sustainable development strategies to follow up the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development and (b) in giving assistance with such plans to developing nations. The general view was that countries were likely to produce a variety of types of strategies and plans dealing with sustainable development, economic development, and environment and conservation policies, reflecting their different circumstances; the OECD however could try to assist international discussions, for example in the United Nations Commission on Sustainable Development, by drawing up its own guidelines on the common features that it might expect to find in strategies or plans that were intended as contributions to sustainable development. Another conclusion was that governments must integrate their policies for economic development and environmental protection.

Packaging Waste

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for monitoring the implementation of the voluntary plan which he has asked the packaging industry to draw up to recover between 50 per cent. and 75 per cent. of packaging waste; what action he proposes to take in the event of the packaging industry failing to meet the targets drawn up by him; and if he will introduce legal targets for the avoidance, minimisation and recycling of packaging waste and measures to boost markets for recycling products.

Mr. Yeo: We believe that a voluntary approach, such as the producer responsibility initiative for packaging waste, will enable industry to devise the most cost effective and flexible methods for securing the Government's objectives for the recovery and recycling of packaging waste and for the reduction at source of packaging. Under producer responsibility we have asked industry to present by Christmas a phased plan to achieve our targets and we will examine their proposals very closely to satisfy ourselves that they are feasible. However, we have also made it clear to industry that if they are not able to satisfy us that they will succeed on a voluntary basis we will consider legislation.

Air Sampling

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the locations of the air sampling station used for official purposes in Greater London; and what assessment he has made as to the adequacy of the range of samples for the safeguarding of the public.

Mr. Yeo: The Government are advised on their monitoring strategy by the Department of the Environment's independent export review groups: the quality of urban air review group; the photochemical oxidants review group; and the review group on acid rain. Advice concerning potential health effects is provided by Department of Health independent export groups, the Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants and the Committee on Medical Aspects of Air Pollution Episodes.

The location of the Department of the Environment's automatic and non-automatic air quality monitoring sites in Greater London are given in the tables.

Bathing Water

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the quality of sea water off the beaches in and adjacent to the Castle Point constituency meets the European Community directive on bathing water standards.

Mr. Yeo: The results of water quality monitoring in the 1993 season for bathing waters in the area are shown in the Department's press release No. 818 copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish the results of the study into the effects on health of sea water bathing around the British coastline which was conducted by pilot study in collaboration with the University of Wales water research centre; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: A report on the pilot study was published on 19 June 1990 and placed in the Library.

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the results of the sea water bathing health study which took place at Southend on Sea on 4 July 1992; and what implications can be drawn from that study on the advisability of sea water bathing in and around the Castle Point constituency.

Mr. Yeo: The study at Southend in 1992 forms part of the four-year programme of research at a number of locations on which the final report will be published shortly.

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if it is safe to bathe from beaches serving the coastline in and adjacent to the Castle Point constituency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Safety will depend on a large number of factors including wind, wave and tidal conditions and the competence of the bather. Methods of risk assessment are described in "Safety on British Beaches" published by RoSPA and RLSS UK. The advice from the Department of Health is that there is minimal risk of serious disease from swimming in British coastal waters.

Civil Servants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of people employed, (b) the total number of black people and (c) the total number of Asians.

Mr. Gummer: The total numbers, and the numbers of black and Asian staff[1] at each grade level are as follows:

Mr. Gummer: Information about the amount paid to the Evening Standard is commercial in confidence.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a full list of all polling organisations who were consulted about draft copies, or asked to undertake pilot studies, in connection with his questionnaire accompanying "London: Making the Best Better"; what was the total cost involved in such pilot studies or consultations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The organisations invited to tender to undertake a pilot study on the questionnaire accompanying the document "London: Making the Best Better" were MORI, NOP and the London Research Centre. The contract was awared to MORI, at a total cost of £4,500 including VAT.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what who was responsible for printing copies of the documen, "London: Making the Best Better" and the accompanying questionnaire.

Mr. Gummer: The Department of the Environment was responsible for printing both the booklet amd the questionnaire. The work was competitively tendered and the contract awarded to Flair Press Ltd.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the task of analysing replies to the document "London: Making the Best Better" has been put out to tender.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer10 December 1993]: No. The analysis of the replies is being undertaken within my Department.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many replies so far received to the document "London: Making the Best Better" questionnaire have been deemed invalid.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 10 December 1993]: Of about 6,500 replies received so far, under 30 are unusable.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider including within the remit of the new agency for environmental protection responsibility for the promotion of recycling and environmentally friendly technology.

Mr. Yeo: The proposed environment agency will bring together the work of the National Rivers Authority, Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and the local authority waste regulators. The detailed functions, powers and duties of this new agency are still under consideration.

Sewage Sludge

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the successive estimates given by his Department of the cost of ending sewage sludge dumping in Britain, together with the names of the external consultants employed to assist with the preparation of such estimates.

Mr. Yeo: The Department said in October 1990 in evidence to the House of Lords Committee on the European Communities, that the initial estimate was of the order of £200 million. In the document "Paying for Quality" published by the Director General for Water Services in July 1993 an estimate of capital costs of around £440 million was given. Further estimates are now being made by the sewerage undertakers in preparation for their submissions to the director general in the context of the current periodic review of price limits.

Coal Workings (Toxic Leaks)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he plans to ensure that leakage of toxic substances from coal workings will continue to be dealt with following privatisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: It is for mineowners to ensure that they comply with any discharge consents determined by the National Rivers Authority. The Government will ensure that British Coal's current responsibilities with regard to the physical legacy of mining will be carried forward after privatisation.

Harzardous Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements will be put in place to replace Directive 78/319/EEC on toxic and dangerous waste.

Mr. Yeo: The Council of Ministers has agreed that member states will continue to apply the provisions of this directive, which is repealed on 12 December, until the Hazardous Waste Directive—91/689/EEC—comes into force in the spring of 1995. In the United Kingdom this agreement will be effected by retaining waste management controls including the 1980 Special Waste Regulations. The regulations will be revised to implement the new directive; they will be the subject of future consultation.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of the United Kingdom's submission to the European Commission under article 37, provisions of the Euratom treaty concerning radioactive waste discharges from THORP.

Mr. Yeo: The "General Data" required to be provided to the EC Commission under article 37 of the Euratom treaty on the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield, have been placed in the Library of the House. The Commission gave a favourable opinion on this plant as published in the Official Journal of the European Communities on 21 May 1992.

Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what expenditure was incurred by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in each of the financial years 1991-92 and 1992-93, and what is the projected expenditure for 1993-94, on work contracted out in sampling and monitoring;

(2) what expenditure was incurred by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in each of the financial years 1991-92 and 1992-93, and what is the projected expenditure for 1993-94, on work contracted out in research on areas other than preparation for technical guidance;

(3) what expenditure was incurred by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in each of the financial years 1991-92 and 1992-93, and what is the projected expenditure for 1993-94, on work contracted out in information technology;

(4) what expenditure was incurred by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in each of the financial years 1991-92 and 1992-93, and what is the projected expenditure for 1993-94, on work contracted out in preparation for technical guidance;

(5) what expenditure was incurred by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in each of the financial years 1991-92 and 1992-93, and what is the projected expenditure for 1993-94, on work contracted out in management consultancy services other than information technology.

Mr. Yeo: The information is as follows:

£ million

	1991-92	1992-93	Projected 1993-94
Sampling and monitoring	1·3	1·6	2·0
Research	6·0	4·9	4·0
Information technology	0·4	1·4	1·4
Technical guidance	0·6	1·0	0·4
Management consultancy	0·3	0·7	0·9

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the current minimum standards of qualification and industrial experience required by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution for new entrants (a) to the pollution inspector grade and (b) to the assistant pollution inspector grade; and if he will make a statement on planned changes in these requirements.

Mr. Yeo: New entrant pollution inspectors and assistant pollution inspectors require a relevant honours degree or equivalent qualification. They must also possess relevant professional experience—normally at least five years for pollution inspectors and two years for assistant pollution inspectors—ideally in a process industry. In addition, they must hold a current United Kingdom driving licence. There are no plans to change these requirements.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the salary costs of civil service staff working for Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in each of the financial years 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94, and what are the projected salary costs for 1993-94, for (a) inspectoral staff and (b) all other staff.

Mr. Yeo: The pollution inspector and assistant pollution inspector grades were not established until 1989 and 1990 respectively. Recruitment since then is as follows:

	Number of external recruits
Date of recruitment campaign	PI	API
1989	8	—
1990	36	7
1991	32	9
1992	24	1

Recruitment from each campaign is geared to HMIP's needs at the time and not to any predetermined PI/API ratio.

Correspondence

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to give a substantive reply to the matters raised with him in a letter dated 16 October by Occan and Morton consultants of Newcastle upon Tyne.

Mr. Baldry: The matters raised in this letter have already been dealt with in official correspondence and in correspondence from the authors of the report by Risk and Policy Analysts Ltd.

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the level of funding for the National Rivers Authority in 1990, 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Yeo: Grant-in-aid paid to the National Rivers Authority was £99·518 million in 1990-91, £83·850 million in 1991-92 and £81·802 million in 1992-93. The reductions are more than offset by increases in income from non-grant sources. Expenditure on grant-aided functions increased by £14 million to £188 million between 1990-91 and 1992-93.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the expected level of funding for the National Rivers Authority in 1994 and 1995.

Mr. Yeo: The public expenditure plans announced on 30 November envisage grant-in-aid funding to the National Rivers Authority of £67·861 million in 1994-95 and £59·876 million in 1995-96. Year on year reductions in grant support largely reflect efficiency savings, and increases in forecast income.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement of the reasons for the cuts in National Rivers Authority funding for 1993-94.

Mr. Yeo: Since the 1992 autumn statement there have been no reductions in grant-in-aid provision for the National Rivers Authority for 1993-94. However, I understand that the authority may underspend its provision.

Ecclesiastical Buildings

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes he is considering in relation to the way in which listed building consent is unnecessary in connection with ecclesiastical buildings owned by the Church of England.

Mr. Baldry: Responsibility for the subject of this question is a matter for the Secretary of State for National Heritage.

Urban Regeneration Agency

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations the Urban Regeneration Agency has had with local authorities; and if he will list those authorities.

Mr. Baldry: David Taylor, the chief executive, and his senior staff are undertaking an extensive programme of regional visits to help inform the development of English Partnerships—the Urban Regeneration Agency—strategy. On each visit they have met representatives from several of the region's local authorities. I will ask Mr. Taylor to write to the hon. Member with a list of the local authorities concerned. Mr. Taylor is also about to meet representatives from local authority associations and individual authorities to discuss the development of a unified financing regime for English Partnerships. In addition, my Department has consulted all local authorities on our draft guidance to English Partnerships which was published in August 1993.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment where the Urban Regeneration Agency is to be based.

Mr. Baldry: English Partnerships—the Urban Regeneration Agency—will have a strong regional structure including a small London office. Its central administrative functions will be based outside London. Other decisions on the locations of its offices have yet to be taken.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement on progress in establishing the Urban Regeneration Agency;

(2) if he will state the budget for 1993-94 and 1994-95 for the Urban Regeneration Agency.

Mr. Baldry: The Urban Regeneration Agency, under its new name of English Partnerships, was launched on 10 November. It has taken over from my Department responsibility for the city grant programme with a budget for the remainder of 1993-94 of £34 million. From April 1994, it will incorporate the derelict land grant and English Estates programmes. For 1994-95, English Partnerships will have a budget of around £250 million including grant-in-aid and estimated receipts from its own activities and the European Union.

City Pride

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the budget for city pride for the years 1993-94 and 1994-95.

Mr. Baldry: No specific resources are set aside for city pride.

Allerton Estate, Bradford

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to announce his decision in relation to the estate action bid, submitted by Bradford council, to regenerate the Allerton estate; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I expect to announce decisions on this and other bids for estate action resources later this month along with local authority HIP allocations.

Local Government Review

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the more strategic functions which will have to be done at a level above unitary councils referred to in the Minister's letter of 22 November to all hon. Members.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Planning had land use planning particularly in mind. Annex B of the policy guidance which we have issued to the Local Government Commission suggests that shared arrangements may also be necessary for functions like transport planning, library and archive services, or emergency planning. Paragraph 17 of that guidance draws attention to the special position of law and order services, where the combining of local government areas may be necessary in order to preserve appropriate structures.

Ozone-depleting Substances

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to imposing a ban on the sale of fridges that use ozone-depleting substances and global warming gases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: The production of chlorofluorocarbons is to be phased out in 1995, and the use within the European Community of hydrochlorofluorocarbons in 2015. The use of HCFC's as refrigerants in domestic fridges and freezers will be banned from 1996, and in industrial refrigeration from 2000. There are no restrictions on the use of HFC's as refrigerants. These have some global warming potential but are essential to enable the industry to move away from ozone-depleting CFC's and HCFC's.

These controls provide strong encouragement to the fridge manufacturing industry to move out of ozone-depleting substances. A ban on sales would not conform to current deregulation initiatives, nor to our commitments under the Montreal protocol. It would threaten free trade within the single market. It would cost jobs and severely hamper the competitiveness of British industry. For these reasons, the Government do not feel that a ban on sales would be appropriate.

Housing

Mr. Milligan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the names of the authorities to be included in the programme for housing transfers by councils in 1994-95

Sir George Young: I am today announcing the names of the 12 authorities who will be able to proceed, on a voluntary basis and subject to the approval of their tenants, with proposals to transfer their housing stock to housing associations during 1994-95.

I am pleased that 14 authorities responded to our invitation and that, as a result of an expanded programme, it has been possible to programme some 50,000 dwellings.

The 12 authorities which have successfully gained a place on the 1994-95 disposals programme, together with the 15 intended recipient housing associations are as follows:

(a) (i) a disposal by Basingstoke and Deane borough council to Basingstoke and Upper Test Housing Association of not more than 4,900 dwelling houses;
    (ii) a disposal by Basingstoke and Deane borough council to Basingstoke and North Hampshire Housing Association of not more than 4,800 dwelling houses;
(b) a disposal by Castle Point borough council to Castle Point Housing Association of not more than 1,900 dwelling houses;

    (ii) a disposal by Cherwell district council to Cherwell Valley Housing Association of not more than 3,489 dwelling houses;
(d) a disposal by Harborough district council to South Leicestershire Housing Association of not more than 2,853 dwelling houses;
(e) a disposal by Maldon district council to Plume Housing Association of not more than 2,100 dwelling houses;
(f) a disposal by Malvern Hills district council to Elgar Housing Association of not more than 4,900 dwelling houses;
(g) a disposal by Mid Beds district council to Mid Beds Housing Association of not more than 3,015 dwelling houses;
(h) a disposal by North Dorset district council to North Dorset Housing Association of not more than 3,000 dwelling houses;
(i) a disposal by Thanet district council to Thanet Community Housing Association of not more than 1,760 dwelling houses;
(j) a disposal by Vale of White Horse district council to the Vale Housing Association of not more than 5,000 dwelling houses;
(k) a disposal by Walsall metropolitan borough council to Beechdale Community Housing Association of not more than 1,548 dwelling houses;
(l) (i) a disposal by Wychavon district council to Evesham and Pershore Housing Association of not more than 4,144 dwelling houses; and
    (ii) a disposal by Wychavon district council to Droitwich Spa and Rural Housing Association of not more than 2,626 dwelling houses.

The programme comprises some 50,000 dwellings valued at more than £560 million.

Section 135 of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 enables the Secretary of State to control housing stock disposals through this annual programme.

Construction Industry

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received a copy of the interim report by Sir Michael Latham to the joint review of procurement and contractual arrangements in the United Kingdom construction industry.

Mr. Baldry: Sir Michael Latham has now presented his interim report, which was due before the end of the year, and I have received a copy. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

I announced the appointment of Sir Michael as the independent reviewer for the joint Government/industry review of procurement and contractual arrangements in the United Kingdom construction industry to the House on 5 July this year.

Sir Michael's final report will be completed in July 1994 and will contain recommendations to Government and other bodies about practical reforms to reduce conflict and litigation and to encourage productivity and competitiveness.

[1] April to December.

[2] January to September.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Attorney-General how many full-time staff equivalent were employed by the Crown Prosecution Service for each of the last seven years for which figures are available.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Television Franchises

14. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many representations he has received on the recent change in the law relating to television franchises and its possible effect on smaller, regional television companies.

Mr. Brooke: This year, I have received 69 representations from hon. Members on the ownership restrictions on the ITV companies, as well as 22 from broadcasters, advertisers, other organisations and 20 from members of the public. The correspondence has included comments about the smaller regional television companies.

Business Sponsorship Incentive Scheme

15. Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what are the latest figures from the business sponsorship incentive scheme.

Mr. Sproat: The figures for 1992-93 indicate a record increase of 33 per cent. in the number of awards and an additional £1·9 million for the arts. It is likely that in 1993-94 the scheme will prove to be even more effective. In recognition of the great success of the scheme, I recently announced that I am increasing its budget by £300,000 to £4·8 million in 1994-95.

BBC Licence Fee

18. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he next plans to meet the chairman of the BBC governors to discuss the BBC licence fee.

Mr. Brooke: I have no plans at present to meet the chairman of the BBC to discuss the television licence fee.

National Lottery

20. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the site of the headquarters of the national lottery.

Mr. Sproat: The site of the headquarters of the national lottery will be a matter for the appointed licensee. Those tendering for the licence will be aware of the advantages of locating in an area receiving Government incentives.

Councils of Ministers

21. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what proposals he has made, following the decisions of the European Councils in Edinburgh 1992 and Brussels 1993, to increase the transparency and accountability of decision-making, including the recording of votes for each member state, at meetings of European Community Councils of Ministers at which his Department is represented; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Government fully support the conclusions reached at Edinburgh and Brussels on openness. On the matter of recording of votes, the Foreign Affairs Council on 6 December agreed that votes on legislative decisions would be published automatically unless a majority of the Council opposed this. This is fully consistent with the conclusions of the Edinburgh European Council last December.

Voting details are now published by the Council secretariat after Council meetings. We shall ensure that this information is provided to Parliament.

Windsor Castle Fire

22. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the latest estimated total cost to public funds of the Windsor castle fire.

Mr. Sproat: It is at present estimated that the cost of the Windsor castle restoration will be between £30 and £40 million of which about £9 to £12 million will be met from public funds.

Independent Television

23. Sir Jim Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is his policy on independent television.

Mr. Brooke: My aim is to ensure that the regulatory framework allows the ITV companies to flourish and to maintain and improve the programme services they provide to audiences in the United Kingdom and overseas, where new opportunities are opening up for United Kingdom broadcasters.

Opera

24. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what research he has conducted into the popularity of opera; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Figures made available to the Arts Council by the British Market Research Bureau indicate that 2·8 million—or over 6 per cent.—of the adult population attend opera performances. This represents an increase of over 30 per cent. in the last five years. Recent studies have also shown that, in addition to those who attend opera, 7 million people now have an interest in the art form. I warmly congratulate all those involved in opera in this country on this remarkable achievement.

Television Programmes

25. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what requirement he has placed on commercial television companies to broadcast British-made programmes; if this requirement applies to BSkyB; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Under the Broadcasting Act 1990, Channel 3 licence holders are required to broadcast regional programmes, of which a suitable proportion should be made within the area. No such requirement applies to BSkyB. But under the EC Television Without Frontiers Directive, all United Kingdom broadcasters, where practicable, have to reserve a majority of their transmission time, subject to certain exclusions, for European works.

Arts Events

26. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how he intends to improve on the latest figures for attendance at arts events.

Mr. Brooke: The improvement of access to the arts is a cornerstone of the Government's policies for the arts, and is also a primary aim of the Arts Council. All Arts Council clients work to enlarge their audiences. Specific marketing initiatives support and direct their work; the latest figures point to the continuing success of these initiatives.

Tourism

27. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many civil servants his Department employs with responsibilities for tourism; and what is the total cost of their salaries.

Mr. Sproat: There are 20 staff employed in my Department's tourism division, including one who works part-time. It is part of the division's role to ensure that the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board make effective and efficient use of the money voted to them by Parliament. The division's salary budget for 1993-94 is £448,820.

BBC Funding

28. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consideration he has given to the funding of the BBC; and when he plans to publish his proposals concerning the renewal of the BBC charter.

Mr. Brooke: I hope to publish a White Paper early next year setting out the Government's proposals for the future of the BBC, including its funding.

Sport (Drug Misuse)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if, when he next meets the chairman of the Sports Council, he will discuss with him the problems of drug misuse in sport.

Mr. Sproat: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of the Sports Council regularly to discuss matters of mutual concern, including the misuse of drugs in sport.

Orchestral Concerts

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many orchestral concerts he has attended in his official capacity since taking office; and how many of these were in London.

Mr. Brooke: Since taking office I have attended 23 concerts involving orchestras or ensembles of various size: 18 of these were in London.

Rugby Football

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what grants from public funds have been paid to the Rugby Football Union for the rebuilding of its ground at Twickenham; what further grants are proposed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: None.

Ecclesiastical Buildings

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what changes he is considering in relation to the way in which listed building consent is unnecessary for work in connection with ecclesiastical buildings owned by the Church of England.

Mr. Brooke: The intention is that the exemption should in future be confined to buildings used primarily as places of worship, and some curtilage structures, and should be available to the Church of England and other church bodies whose internal control systems for works to such buildings meet the requirements of the code of practice which I published on 17 December 1992 at column 370. Following discussions with Church and amenity interests, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are considering to what extent curtilage structures should be included in these arrangements, and what special provision should be made for cathedral complexes. Our conclusions will be embodied in an order under section 60(5) of the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Act 1990, which will be laid before the House in due course.

Film Industry

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consultations he has had with representatives of the film industry.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison).

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his definition of (a) security assurances and (b) security guarantees with regard to (i) the use of nuclear weapons by the United Kingdom against a non-nuclear weapon state and (ii) the commitment of the United Kingdom to defend a non-nuclear weapon state against the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We regard a security guarantee as a commitment through an alliance, such as it contained in article 5 of the North Atlantic treaty, under which we and other states parties have undertaken collectively to take the necessary action to restore and maintain the security of each state member of the Atlantic alliance.

We have in addition issued positive and negative nuclear security assurances to certain non-nuclear weapon states in the following terms:

> "The United Kingdom affirms its intention, as a Permanent Member of the United Nations Security Council, to seek immediate Security Council action to provide assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to any non-nuclear-weapon State, party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, that is a victim of an act of aggression or an object of a threat of aggression in which nuclear weapons are used."

This assurance was given in the United Nations Security Council on 17 June 1968 and was welcomed by the Security Council resolution 255 two days later.

> "Britain undertakes not to use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear-weapon States, which are parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and to other internationally binding commitments not to manufacture or acquire nuclear explosive devices, except in the case of an attack on the United Kingdom, it's dependent territories, it's armed forces or it's allies by such a State in asociation or alliance with a nuclear-weapon state.

The United Kingdom gave this assurance at the United Nations special session on disarmament on 28 June 1978.

Ukraine

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the ratification of the START—strategic arms reduction talks—1 treaty by the Parliament of Ukraine on 18 November.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We issued a statement on 30 November about the Ukrainian Parliament's resolution which ratified the START 1 treaty. A copy of the statement has been placed in the House of Commons library.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans his Department has to meet Ukrainian officials and politicians to discuss the ratification of the START 1 treaty by the Parliament of Ukraine on 18 November.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have already discussed this question with Ukrainian Government officials, and have made clear our concerns along the lines of the public statement we made on 30 November, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. We have also made our views clear to members of the Ukrainian Parliament.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department has received from Ukraine a draft treaty on security guarantees for Ukraine; and what plans his Department has to respond to such a draft treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received from the Ukrainian ambassador a copy of a draft security treaty for signature by the five nuclear weapon states. The draft treaty would come into force on entry into force of the START 1 treaty, and it does not commit Ukraine to accession to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty—NPT—as a non-nuclear weapon state. We have made clear to the Ukrainian Government that Ukraine will be covered by our national security assurances once she accedes to the NPT as a non-nuclear weapon state.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to discuss the ratification of the START 1 treaty by the Parliament of Ukraine on 18 November with his NATO counterparts (a) prior to and (b) at the NATO summit in January 1994; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This question was discussed at the ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council on 2

December. Allies agreed that NATO should consider in the context of preparations for its January summit what steps the alliance might take to encourage the early entry into force and rapid implementation of all provisions of the START 1 treaty.

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the recent Council of Europe document concerning the influx of illegal settlers from Turkey into northern Cyprus; and if he will make a statement on Government policy regarding this official Council of Europe document.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We too are concerned by reports of an influx of settlers from Turkey into northern Cyprus. The issue needs to be addressed in the context of an overall settlement. We share the hope of the United Nations Secretary-General that progress can be made with a resumption of intercommunal talks in the new year. We shall continue to support him in his efforts to achieve this.

Kashmir

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Indian Government as to the recent activities of the Indian security forces in occupied Kashmir following the disturbance at Sopore in which a number of people were killed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs discussed the security situation in Kashmir with the Indian Prime Minister and Home Minister on 15 November. Following the incident at Sopore on 26 November our high commission in New Delhi asked the Indian Home Ministry for details. We were informed that some 15 people were killed, including 11 militants, following an attack on the Indian army.

Endangered Species

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 278, if he will specify the seal and whale species for which the Norwegian Government are requesting exemptions from the European Council habitats directive.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Norwegian Government have asked for exemptions from the European Community's habitats directive in respect of grey, harbour, harp, hooded and ring seals; and minke, fin and killer whales.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to resist any attempt by the Norwegian Government to secure exemptions from the EC habitats directive in respect of seals and whales.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We oppose the commercial hunting of whales and support the listing of seal species in the annexes of the EC Habitats Directive. Norway's requests for exemptions from the directive are, however, a matter for the Community as a whole. We shall consult with other member states in preparing the Community's response.

Committee of the Regions

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the full membership of the British delegation to the European Union Committee of the Regions.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As I told the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) in my written reply on 28 October at column 735, we have proposed the following list of nominees for appointment by the Council to the European Community Committee of the Regions:

Mrs. Parveen Akhtar Ahmed

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will arrange for Mrs. Parveen Akhtar Ahmed, the wife of Mr. Tariq Hussain Ahmed, of Bradford to be interviewed at the high commission in Islamabad as a matter of urgency; when Mrs. Ahmed was granted a visa to join her husband in the United Kingdom; whether her passport carries a stamp confirming that she has been granted indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom; if he will arrange for Mr. Ahmed to be given full information about what documentation is required before Mrs. Ahmed attends an interview to determine when she is to be granted permission to rejoin her husband; for how long Mrs. Ahmed has been seeking to return to the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In the absence of any information in London about Mrs. Parveen Akhtar Ahmed's application for entry clearance, I have asked the British high commission in Islamabad to let me have a report. I shall arrange for the hon. Member to receive a substantive reply from the migration and visa correspondence unit of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office as soon as possible.

Aisha Bibi

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a decision is going to be taken by the United Kingdom post in Islamabad into the application by Aisha Bibi—Ref: HO K461344; and HUL/338/93—to join her husband, Zaib Alam Khan.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In the absence of any information in London about an entry clearance application from Aisha Bibi, I have asked the British high commission in Islamabad to let me have a report. I shall arrange for the hon. Member to receive a substantive reply from the migration and visa correspondence unit of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office as soon as possible.

Burundi

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what pledges have been made by donor Governments to finance the Organisation of African Unity initiative in respect of Burundi.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Several major donors have expressed an interest in providing financial and logistical support for the OAU's International Mission for Protection, Observation and Confidence-building in Burundi. Discussions between potential donors and the OAU have been taking place in Addis Ababa.

We have no plans to contribute towards financing the OAU initiative. The United Kingdom has already committed one million dollars to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia and we anticipate that other European partners, who did not contribute to this fund, will take the lead in Burundi.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the arrival of OAU forces in Burundi.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We understand that the OAU plan to send 20 civilians and 180 military personnel in the first instance. As far as we know, none have yet arrived in Burundi.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what mediation efforts are currently taking place in Burundi.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Both the OAU Secretary-General's representative, Senegal's representative in Ethiopia, Ambassador Fall and the United Nations Under-Secretary General, James Jonah, have recently visited Burundi to discuss the situation with the parties concerned. The United Nations Secretary-General's special representative, Ahmedou Ould Abdallah, has been holding discussions in Burundi since 2 December. The OAU discussed Burundi at its mini-summit in Cairo on 7 December.

Angola (Arms Embargo)

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the recently lifted arms embargo on Angola was imposed; what publicity was given to the decision at the time; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: When Angola became independent in 1976, the restrictions on the supply of defence equipment which at that time applied to the Soviet Union and its close allies, were applied to Angola. We are not aware that this policy was made public.

TRANSPORT

London Underground

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his best estimate of the likely cost to London Underground of compensation sought by customers under the relevant citizen charters arising from the major breakdowns on the system from 24 November onwards.

Mr. Norris: London Underground currently estimates that the value of the claims made under their customer charter will be between £150,000 and £200,000.

Road Safety Database

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) of 6 December, Official Report, column 22, which other member state abstained in the vote on setting up a Community road safety database.

Mr. MacGregor: The other member state to abstain was Germany.

Rail Privatisation

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what so far has been the cost to public funds of railway privatisation.

Mr. Freeman: The costs set out include those of special advisers where appropriate, and the costs attributable to preparations for the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising and the Office of Rail Regulation before the start of this financial year:

Department of Transport: Running costs, etc.

	£ million
1991-92	0·5
1992-93	1·2
1993-94 expected expenditure	1·5

Department of Transport: Consultancy costs

	£ million
1991-92	0·5
1992-93	5·5
1993-94 expected expenditure	12·0

The Department of Transport's internal BR privatisation costs cannot be separately identified before September 1991.

Office of passenger rail franchising

	£ million
1993-94 expected expenditure	3·4

Office of rail regulator

	£ million
1993-94 expected expenditure	3·3

British Rail's costs and estimates are a matter for British Rail.

Testing Stations

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has in respect of the casual staff currently employed in testing stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The vehicle inspectorate—VI—has full peronnel responsibility for such staff. VI continues to employ casual staff because this allows it the flexibility it needs to deal with fluctuating demand and other short term staffing needs. Casual appointments will be kept under review and casual staff will be recruited, retained or released in order to meet the needs existing at any one time.

Electronic Road Tolling

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends that electronic road tolling should apply to trunk roads which form part of the trans-European road network but which are not classified as motorways; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: In his statement on 2 December about the Government's plans for motorway charging at column 650 my right hon. Friend said that the precise definition of the network to be charged was an issue for further consideration.

Motorways

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what communications he has had with either the Commission or the European Community or the Governments of its member states concerning charging vehicles for use of motorways; and if he regards such schemes or proposals as a component of the single internal market in transport.

Mr. Key [holding answer 10 December 1993]: My right hon. Friend maintains regular contact with the Commission and his colleagues in other member states on motorway charging.

Council directive 93/89/EEC, adopted on 25 October this year, sets out, among other things, the conditions under which member states may impose tolls or user charges on heavy goods vehicles over 12 tonnes gross on motorways and similar roads. This direcive will help eliminate distortion of competition in road goods transport in the European Community.

A38

Mr. Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he hopes to announce the preferred route for the improvements to the A38 trunk road between Saltash and Trerulefoot; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key [holding answer 10 December 1993]: We are still considering responses to the recent public consultation, including suggestions for alternative routes.

I hope to announce the preferred route in spring 1944.

Research Laboratory, Crowthorne

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the size of the land holdings of the Transport and Road Research Laboratory at Crowthorne; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Under a valuation survey conducted in 1988 by Hillier Parker on behalf of the PSA, the size of the TRL site was found to be approximately 256 English acres which is 103·6 hectares.

A privatisation study is presently being conducted at TRL; until this has been completed I am unable to give more information.

Motorways (Noise)

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce type approval standards for the approval of noise levels produced by motorway road surfaces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Type approval standards are not appropriate for the noise levels arising from road surfaces. The Department provides a specification setting limits on the surface texture, which seeks to minimise the level of noise from traffic consistent with safety requirements for adequate skidding resistance.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Overseas Aid

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of gross domestic product the overseas aid budget will be in 1994-95, assuming the figures for the growth of the economy given in the Budget.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have been asked to reply.

The total provision for ODA's external assistance programmes, announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 30 November, amounts to 0·34 per cent. of forecast GDP in 1994-95, on the basis of the figures given in the Financial Statement and Budget Report. Not all of ODA's total provision counts as official development assistance under the OECD development assistance committee criteria. Internationally accepted ratios of overseas aid to gross national product (GNP) are calculated annually for the development assistance committee of the OECD, according to agreed international criteria and on the basis of expenditure by calendar year not on planning figures.

Prices

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest information he has for (a) the last quarter and (b) over the last 12 months of the change in (i) manufacturers' prices and (ii) producer prices.

Mr. Nelson: The available information for October 1993 is as follows:

Producer prices—all manufacturing

	Materials and fuel purchased per cent.	Output prices per cent.
Increase over last three months	−2·4	0·2
Increase over last twelve months	0·9	4·0

The increase over the last three months will be affected by seasonal fluctuations.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the underlying rate of inflation is accounted for by changes in the price of (a) clothing and footwear, (b) household and leisure goods and (c) council tax.

Mr. Nelson: The underlying rate of inflation, as measured by the 12-month percentage movement in the retail prices index excluding mortgage interest payments, stood at 2·8 per cent. in October 1993. Of this clothing and footwear contributed 0·06 percentage points household and leisure goods 0·13 percentage points and council tax/community charge/rates −0·30 percentage points towards the overall figure.

Business Investment

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish a table giving business investment measured in current prices as a percentage of gross domestic product, measured in current prices (a) for each year since 1974 and (b) for each quarter since 1988; and what was the average for the periods 1974 to 1979 and 1979 to 1992;

(2) what proportion of gross domestic product he estimates is accounted for by gross business investment (a) in 1993-94 and (b) in each year since 1989.

Mr. Nelson: The latest estimates of business investment at current and constant prices and gross domestic product at current and constant market prices to the third quarter of 1993 are available on the CSO database which may be accessed by the House of Commons Library. The relevant database identifiers are DEOO and CAOB at current prices and DEMS and CAOO at constant prices. Her Majesty's Treasury does not publish financial year forecasts of business investment.

Incomes

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total and average investment income and earned income in 1992-93 of (a) the top 1 per cent., (b) the top 5 per cent., (c) the top 10 per cent., (d) the bottom 70 per cent., (e) the bottom 50 per cent., (f) the bottom 10 per cent. of taxpayers and (g) all taxpayers.

Mr. Dorrell: Latest estimates are given in the table:

Quantile group of taxpayers	Total earned income[1] (£ billion)	Average earned income (£)	Total investment income (£ billion)	Average investment income (£)
Top 1 per cent.	24	95,500	8	29,900
Top 5 per cent.	62	49,200	13	10,100
Top 10 per cent.	95	37,700	16	6,400
Bottom 70 per cent.	156	8,800	9	700
Bottom 50 per cent.	91	7,200	8	600
Bottom 10 per cent.	11	4,500	1	500
All taxpayers	345	13,700	35	1,400

[1] Income from employment, self-employment and pensions.

VAT

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the estimated yield in 1993-94 of the imposition of VAT at (a) 5 per cent., (b) 17·5 per cent. and (c) 22 per cent. on (i) books, (ii) newspapers, (iii) magazines, (iv) rent and (v) fares on passenger transport.

Sir John Cope: The actual yield would depend on the effects on consumers behaviour. Without allowing for such behavioural changes, the Treasury publication, 'Tax Ready Reckoner and Tax Reliefs' shows the cost of not standard rating currently zero rated items. The figures for books, newspapers and magazines has been apportioned into each category using shares of consumers' expenditure. From these figures it is possible to derive the following table in £ million for 1994-95.

	5 per cent.	17½ per cent.	22 per cent.
Books	95	330	415
Newspapers	155	550	690
Magazines	65	220	275
Domestic passenger transport	330	1,150	1,445

The publication also shows the cost of net standard rating VAT exempt items. Rent on domestic dwellings is exempt and not zero rated. If the exemption were removed the estimate on the basis given above would be £2,300 million at 17·5 per cent. Equivalent calculations for 5 per cent. and 22 per cent. have not been made.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to close the loopholes for VAT liability afforded by the pre-payment of accounts.

Sir John Cope: None. Under both United Kingdom and EC law, VAT is chargeable at the rate in force when payment is made if that precedes the delivery of the goods or the issue of a tax invoice.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the rates of VAT charged in each other EC country for (a) food in shops, (b) food in restaurants, (c) books, (d) magazines, (e) newspapers, (f) household fuel, (g) rents, (h) house purchase, (e) children's clothing, (j) community centres and (k) transport fares.

Sir John Cope: Rates of VAT charged in each other EC country for food in shops, books, magazines, newspapers, household fuel, house purchase, children's clothing and transport fares are set out in the Official Report, 24 November 1993, columns 66-70. VAT rates on food in restaurants, rents and community centres according to the latest information available, are set out in the tables.

(b) VAT on food in restaurants in the EC

Country	Rate per cent.
Belgium	19·5
Denmark	25
France	18·6[1]
Germany	8
Greece	18 (13)[2]
Ireland	12·5
Italy	9[3]
Luxembourg	3
Netherlands	17·5
Portugal	16 (12)[4]
Spain	6, 15[5]
United Kingdom	17·5

[1] The following rates apply generally in Corsica: 0·9 per cent., 2·1 per cent., 8 per cent. and 13 per cent.

[2] The rate in brackets applies in the departments of Lesbos, Chios, the Dodecanese and the Cyclades, and in the islands of Thasos, the Northern Sporades, Samothrace and Skyros.

[3] Excluding the supply of food in luxury premises including luxury hotels.

[4] The rate in brackets apply in the autonomous regions of Madeira and the Azores Archipelagoes.

[5] The standard rate applies to the supply of food in luxury hotels.

(g) VAT on rents in the EC

The letting of immovable property is exempt from VAT in every member state, although some member states operate an option to tax in certain circumstances.

(j) VAT on community centres in the EC

Leasing of such buildings is exempt in all member states. For purchase (including construction) in other member states the rates in the table on house purchase apply.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether the issue of value added tax on imported works of art is likely to be considered at the December meeting of ECOFIN; and what views he will be expressing on this subject at that meeting;

(2) if he will make a statement of his policy on the future of imported works of art in connection with value added tax;

(3) what assessment he has made of the possible impact of the imposition of value added tax on imported works of art upon London's world position as a centre for the trade in art objects; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: The subject of VAT on second hand goods, including works of art, antiques and collectors items, was discussed again at ECOFIN today and agreement was reached on the Seventh VAT Directive. Under this agreement margin schemes will be extended to all second hand goods. No VAT other than that in the member state of purchase will be payable when works of art, antiques and collectors items are moved from one member state to another.

Imports of such items into the European Union from third countries will be charged VAT at not less than 5 per cent. except in the United Kingdom where imports of pre-1973 works of art will be charged at an effective rate of 2½ per cent. until mid-1999. Items imported temporarily for resale and subsequent export outside the EU will not be chargeable with VAT. The Commission will review the effects of the new arrangements in 1998 and report to the Council.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have had full consultations with the art trade on these matters throughout the very long period they have been under discussion. The agreement avoids potentially damaging legal actions and means that the United Kingdom art market will have the most favourable VAT regime in the EU and will be able to maintain its pre-eminence in the world.

Company Failures

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much was lost, in the last year for which figures are available, in public revenue in PAYE, national insurance contributions and VAT from (a) companies which went into voluntary creditors liquidation and (b) unincorporated businesses which became bankrupt.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is available only at disproportionate cost.

Capital Expenditure

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much he estimates net public capital expenditure will fall by 1997.

Mr. Portillo: Outturn and projections for public sector capital expenditure are set out in table 5.3 of the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1994-95.

Taxation

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate for 1993-94 the number of people claiming (a) one-parent benefit and (b) the widowed mother's allowance, who are taxpayers.

Mr. Dorrell: In 1993-94 it is estimated that about 350,000 taxpayers will claim one-parent benefit and about 40,000 taxpayers will claim widowed mother's allowance.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the number of additional people brought into the tax system as a result of the freezing of personal tax allowances proposed in the March Budget.

Mr. Dorrell: In 1993-94 no one was brought into income tax as a result of the changes announced in the March Budget. However, about 300,000 more people pay tax in 1993-94 under the Budget proposals compared with statutory indexation of personal allowances.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was (a) the total income, both earned and unearned, (b) the total national insurance contributions and (c) the total tax paid by (i) the top 1 per cent., (ii) the top 5 per cent., (iii) the top 10 per cent., (iv) the bottom 50 per cent. and (v) all taxpayers for Scotland, England Wales and Northern Ireland in each year since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 10 December 1993]: Readily available estimates based on the Survey of Personal Incomes are in the tables. For 1980-81 and 1989-90, married couples are counted as one taxpayer and their incomes are combined. Following the introduction of independent taxation in 1990-91. husbands and wives are counted seperately. The estimates of total income relate to income subject to income tax and exclude non-taxable income such as certain social security benefits. The quantile groups of taxpayers are defined by reference to the number of taxpayers in each country in each year.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

World Bank

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria the United Kingdom's executive director of the World bank uses to determine whether a project merits evaluation by the Overseas Development Administration.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The ODA determines case by case what examination of loan proposals is required, paying particular attention to adjustment operations and environmentally sensitive projects.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will list prospective World bank projects and projects currently being implemented and being evaluated by the Overseas Development Administration and those that are currently being considered for co-financing by the Overseas Development Administration;

(2) if he will list all World bank projects and structural adjustment loans that the Overseas Development Administration has co-financed in each year since 1989.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are compiling the information and I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to take to assist in resolving conflicts in the Narmada valley following the withdrawal of World bank funding for the project.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Project implementation is the responsibility of the Indian authorities. In bilateral contacts with them, we have urged the correct and sensitive handling of the environmental and resettlement issues.

Kenya

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he took to ensure that the World bank and the IMF took full account of reported corruption in Kenya prior to resuming financial assistance.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We maintain close contact with the World bank and the International Monetary Fund on Kenya and regularly discuss shared concerns, including corruption. We are confident that the IFIs took full account of all relevant factors during their recent review of Kenya's economic position and prospects. At the consultative group meeting last month donors emphasised the need for the Kenya Government to act to ensure that prompt legal action is taken against those involved in corruption.

Thailand

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place a copy of the mid-term review of the World's bank's Pak Mun dam project in Thailand in the Library.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Under the Disclosure of Information policy approved by the Bank's board, this report remains confidential. I regret, therefore, that I cannot place a copy in the Library.

South Africa

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the present and planned resources that are being used by the United Kingdom, European Union, Commonwealth and agencies of the United Nations to assist South Africa to hold free and fair elections and make the transition to a multiparty, multi-ethnic democracy.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: All aid from Britain and the organisations listed supports change to a democratic and non-racial society in South Africa. Our bilateral aid of £11·7 million in 1992-93 is expected to increase to up to £15 million in 1993-94, plus about £11 million as our annual share of the EC's £68 million programme. We do not have figures for Commonwealth and United Nations activities. The Commonwealth has provided international observers to help monitor and defuse violence during the transition; and the United Nations is providing training for black South Africans. We and the other organisations plan to assist with next year's elections. Our main bilateral contribution will be international election observers.

Kenya (Cereals Shortage)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Kenyan Government as to the possible supplying of cereals now held in EC intervention to alleviate the shortage of cereals in Kenya; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My noble Friend, the Minister for Overseas Development will be visiting Kenya in January. We expect the question of how donors can most appropriately help to meet Kenya's food needs during 1994 to be discussed during this visit.

HEALTH

Fundholders

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the registered population were covered by general practitioner fundholders in total and in each region at (a) 1 April 1992 and (b) 1 April 1993; and what figure she expects to be achieved by 1 April 1994.

Dr. Mawhinney: At 1 April 1992 13 per cent. of the population were registered with general practitioner fundholders. At 1 April 1993 the figure was 25 per cent. and this is expected to grow to about a third of the population from 1 April 1994.

The regional breakdown is:

	Per cent.
At 1 April 1992:
Northern	16
Yorkshire	21
Trent	14
East Anglia	8
North West Thames	14
North East Thames	7
South East Thames	9
South West Thames	15
Wessex	15
Oxford	23
South Western	14

	Per cent.
West Midlands	13
Mersey	19
North Western	9
At 1 April 1993:
Northern	25
Yorkshire	23
Trent	31
East Anglia	25
North West Thames	27
North East Thames	14
South East Thames	22
South West Thames	25
Wessex	22
Oxford	33
South Western	19
West Midlands	26
Mersey	25
North Western	17

Note: All figures have been rounded to the nearest whole number.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide an estimate for the value of fund-holding allocations retained by general practitioner fund-holders at the year end.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 6 December 1993]: Although not all general practitioner fundholders' accounts for the year 1992-93 have been audited yet, it is estimated that fundholders achieved efficiency savings of about £28 million or 3·3 per cent., of total budgets. These impressive efficiency gains will be re-invested in further service improvements for patients.

Nursing Staff

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital nurses, midwives, health visitors and district nurses there were in England at 30 September in each year since 1988.

Mr. Sackville: The information available is shown in the table.

Notes:

1. All figures are rounded to the nearest ten and exclude agency staff.
2. Project 2000 students are shown separately because Project 2000 students are supernumerary and therefore not included in workforce totals.

Mental Health

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to amend sections 35 and 36 of the Mental Health Amendment Act 1983 (a) to endorse treatment to be given to patients detained under section 35 and (b) to enable magistrates to remand mentally disordered offenders to hospital for treatment.

Mr. Bowis: None at present, but we shall be keeping in mind the case for amending these provisions should a suitable opportunity arise.

NHS Pensions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give the definition of a national health service pension enhancement; and if such enhancements are available to all national health service pensionable staff.

Dr. Mawhinney: There is no statutory definition of a national health service pension enhancement, but payments based on the crediting of additional services can be made to compensate for the loss of future pension rights on premature or ill-health retirement. Such enhancements are available to all national health service pensionable employees who satisfy certain criteria.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the annual cost to her Department of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91; and how many vehicles were involved.

Mr. Sackville: There were four cars and the basic cost was £175,543.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list those areas in which it is inappropriate for her to intervene within NHS trusts.

Dr. Mawhinney: National health service trusts have the freedom to:

Aquire, own and dispose of assets to ensure the most effective use is made of them.

Make their own cases for capital development direct to the NHS Management Executive (NHSME).

Borrow money, within annually agreed limits, primarily for new buildings and equipment and for upgrading existing buildings.

Create their own management structures.

Employ their own staff, determine their own staffing structures, and set out terms and conditions of employment.

Advertise their services, within guidelines set down by professonal codes of practice on such advertising.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has a range of reserve powers to intervene in trusts' affairs. These are not to be used routinely.

NHS Commercial Activities

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what controls she exercises over commercial activities carried out on behalf of the NHS within trust hospitals.

Mr. Sackville: It is for each individual national health service trust to determine the level of commercial activity carried out on its premises, subject to this not being to the detriment of other obligations.

Oral Contraceptives

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total cost to the national health service of the free prescription of oral contraceptives.

Mr. Sackville: The net ingredient cost of oral contraceptives dispensed or administered on the prescription of general practitioners in England in 1992 was £42·5 million.

Firearm Deaths

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide a table on the occupations of people who died as a result of (a) suicides, (b) homicides and (c) accidents and other causes involving (i) shotguns and (ii) other firearms in each year since 1979.

Mr. Sackville: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Special Hospitals

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to publish the findings of the Swann inquiry into women's services at Ashworth special hospital.

Mr. Bowis: The inquiry was set up by and submitted its report to the Special Hospitals Service Authority.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she is taking to inquire into allegations of over-medication in certain wards of Ashworth special hospital.

Mr. Bowis: These allegations have been fully considered and investigated by local management in consultation with the clinical staff concerned. The Special Hopitals Service Authority is currently implementing an action plan for women patients, which includes a review of levels of medication.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement about the future of the social work service in special hospitals.

Mr. Bowis: Social workers play an important role within multi-disciplinary teams at the special hospitals.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients in special hospitals have become schizophrenic as a result of the withdrawal of neuroleptic drugs; and how many patients in special hospitals have been over-medicated on neuroleptic drugs in each of the past two years.

Mr. Bowis: Information about the treatment of individual patients in special hospitals is not available centrally. It is a matter for the Special Hospitals Service Authority.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the incidents of patient violence at Ashworth special hospital (a) against staff and (b) against other patients, in each of the last two years.

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mrs. Anne-Marie Nelson, chairman of the Special Hospitals Service Authority, which has responsibility for Ashworth hospital, for details.

Southend Health Authority

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in resolving the relative underfunding of the Southend health authority; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: In 1992-93 Southend health authority received £2·695 million extra funding and in 1993-94 £1·550 million. Under the weighted capitation funding system, health authorities are funded for their resident population. Departmental guidance, EL(92)47 copies of which are available in the Library, gives regional health authorities discretion to use their judgment about the precise distribution of funds which suits their districts' needs, based on the analysis of local information. The present allocation for South Essex health authority is a matter for North East Thames regional health authority and the hon. Member may wish to contact Sir William Staveley, the chairman for details.

Mental Health

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish details of all grants currently approved by her Department to support projects connected with mental health.

Mr. Bowis: The mental illness specific grant, introduced in April 1991, is payable to local authorities to enable them to make a significant improvement in the social care services they provide for mentally ill people in the community. This year, 1993-94, £34·4 million is available to 108 local authorities. Their individual allocations are listed in table A, the total includes £1,770,000 approved for revenue costs of short stay hostels under the Department's homeless mentally ill initiative for London. Other grants approved in 1993-94 to support this initiative are as follows:

Capital costs of short stay hostels—£1,585,986
Community psychiatric teams—£1,695,000

Under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 the Department gives grants towards the administrative—core—costs of national voluntary organisations and to support national development projects or innovative local projects with potential for national application. In the field of mental illness 56 grants are being made to 36 voluntary bodies at a total cost of £2,336,020 in 1993-94. These grants are listed in table B.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what statistics she collects on the operation of the Registered Homes Act 1984; and if she will publish them.

Mr. Bowis: The Department collects information on the number of homes registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984 as at 31 March each year. This relates to registered residential care homes, registered nursing homes and homes registered both as residential homes and nursing homes.

Information on registered residential care homes is published annually in "Residential Accommodation for Elderly and for Younger Physically Disabled People: All Residents in Local Authority, Voluntary and Private Homes England" and "Residential Accommodation for mentally ill people and people with learning disabilities: Number of local authority, voluntary and private homes and places England".

For registered nursing homes the information is published annually in "Private Hospitals, Homes and Clinics Registered Under Section 23 of the Registered Homes Act".

Copies of these publications are available in the Library.

Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the number of sampling points and the frequency of sampling in each district health authority where samples have been taken to test for the incidence of paralytic shellfish poisoning for the last 24 months; and what have been the results.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

Samples of mussels have been taken by environmental health officers for many years from the NE coast of England, where PSP is known to occur seasonally from April to September. Sampling begins fortnightly in April from eight sites from Berwick-on-Tweed to Bridlington, increasing at the height of the season to sampling from each site every week. Results followed the expected pattern in 1992 and 1993, peaking at 148·2 microgrammes of Saxitoxin equivalent/100g in June 1992 and 1,587·5 microgrammes of Saxitoxin equivalent/100g in May 1993.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Market Testing

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give details of the savings achieved by the competing for quality programme; on what basis he has calculated the figure; and whether this figure was offset against the total cost of the market-testing programme.

Mr. Waldegrave: In the 18 months to September 1993, provisional estimates suggest the programme will lead to savings of approximately £100 million of savings per year.

This figure is the difference between the annual cost of activities before testing and their annual cost afterwards, taking account of the redundancy and other costs attributable to the individual market tests. Where costs before testing have not been reported, no savings have been attributed.

European Parliament (Administration)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what errors there were in the information the Cabinet Office communicated to candidates for the European Parliament open competition mentioned in his answer of 14 June, Official Report, column 398, on the status of their application for these posts; and what communication he will make to those candidates with regard to the status of their application.

Mr. Davis: I am unaware of any errors in the information given by the Cabinet Office to candidates for this competition but I would be happy to look into any specific case brought to my attention.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will seek from his Italian counterpart a copy of the report prepared by the Italian Nuclear Regulatory Authorities—DISP—evaluating the readiness of Italian nuclear waste storage facilities to receive back reprocessing radioactive wastes from Sellafield.

Mr. Eggar: Arrangements for the return of waste are, in the first instance, a matter for British Nuclear Fuels plc and its customers in line with the contracts between them. These arrangements are supported by inter-governmental letters. Since 1976, BNFL's contracts for the reprocessing of overseas spent fuel have contained options for the return of wastes. The Government intend that these options will be exercised and wastes returned.

Textiles

Sir David Knox: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give details of the current average rates of import duties and other restrictions on both textile and clothing products in the United States of America, Australia, South Africa, China, India, Pakistan, Indonesia, Sri Lanka, Brazil, Lithuania, Malaysia, Bulgaria, Philippines, Mexico, Argentina and South Korea.

Mr. Needham: A table showing import duty rates and remarks on restrictions for textiles and clothing products in the 16 named countries follows.

In most cases a minimum and maximum rate are shown instead of an average duty rate because textile and clothing products cover a large range of tariff headings. Duty rates for a number of countries are likely to change as a consequence of the Uruguay round agreement. Further information on restrictions may be available from United Kingdom Posts overseas; to check this would have incurred disproportionate costs.

	Duty rate (per cent.)	Remarks
USA	0-38	38 per cent. plus 48·5c/Kg No restrictions for United Kingdom textiles.
Australia	3-34	No restrictions. Quota system finished.
South Africa		Textiles: Duty calculated on weight, 10 Rand per kilogram, or value, 50 per cent. of total consignment value (FOB), whichever is the greater. Surcharge of 5 per cent. Clothing: Duty calculated on weight, 50 Rand per kilogram, or value, 100 per cent. of total consignment value, which-ever is the greater. Surcharge of 15 per cent. Quotas are in place but have not been reached.
China	3-100	No known restrictions.
India		Textiles: 85 per cent. plus 35 per cent. central excise tariff. Import licence required. Clothing: Imports banned.
Pakistan	(a) 95 (b) 110	(a) Does not include manufacturing tax. (b) Includes manufacturing tax. No known restrictions.
Indonesia	5-45	Licensing requirements.
Sri Lanka	10-50	No known restrictions.
Brazil	10-20	No known restrictions.
Lithuania	15	No known restrictions.
Malaysia	(a) 2-30 (b) 25-35	(a) Textiles: some products have sales tax 10 per cent. and 5 per cent. Surtax. (b) Clothing: 10 per cent. sales tax and 5 per cent. surtax for a majority of imports. No other restrictions.
Bulgaria	5-25	Temporary import surcharge on all goods of 3 per cent. 1993, 2 per cent. 1994.
Philippines	3-50	No restrictions.
Mexico	5-20	Certificate of origin and labelling requirements.
Argentina	15-20	No restrictions.
South Korea	2-10	No restrictions.

Export Licences

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 25 November, Official Report, columns 252-53, if he will publish a table showing the number of export licences (a) approved and (b) refused in each year since 1984 under the heading ML7, relating to military defence against biological agents.

Mr. Needham: Export licences (a) approved and (b) refused for goods under the heading ML7 from 1992 to 8 December 1993 are as follows:

1992	310
1993	206
(b)
1993	0

ML7 is an entry in the Export of Goods (Control) Order which includes controls on biological agents themselves, as well as equipment for military defence against them. Records of export licences are kept for seven years. It would be possible for the precise information requested covering the period 1986 to date to be provided, but only at a disproportionate cost.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91; and how many vehicles were involved.

Mr. Eggar: The annual cost in 1990-91 of the car service for Ministers was £223,966 (including VAT), for five cars.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what responsibilities fall on British Nuclear Fuels to cover the full costs of application of (a) Euratom safeguards, (b) International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards and (c) safeguards, pursuant to Cmnd 6730, at (i) the Magnox reprocessing line and (ii) the thermal oxide reprocessing line at Sellafield.

Mr. Eggar: In accordance with the Euratom treaty and the statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the costs of the application of safeguards by these two bodies are met through the contributions made to their budgets by their member states.

Enforcement Agencies Code

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, column 738, on the publication of a code for enforcement agencies, what estimate he has made of the cost of publication by the agencies of their own codes of practice.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Deregulation Ministers are responsible for ensuring that enforcement agencies publish their own codes of practice setting out how they have met the principles in "Working with Business: a code for enforcement agencies". Therefore, it is for Departmental Deregulation Ministers to determine what resources should be devoted to publication of the codes of practice taking into account the size and nature of the business community with whom each of the enforcement agencies deal.

Atomic Energy Authority

Mr. Mills: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the current level of public funding of the Atomic Energy Authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The Atomic Energy Authority operates as a trading fund and does not receive grant in aid from the Government. The Atomic Energy Authority currently has outstanding long-term borrowing from the national loans fund of £124·4 million. It is intended that the Atomic Energy Authority's borrowing should progressively decrease over the public expenditure planning period. In 1992-93 approximately £320 million of the Atomic Energy Authority's turnover came from work undertaken for Government Departments and other public sector organisations. Where practicable work for the Government is increasingly subject to competition in line with Government policy.

Business Licences

Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the business licence requirements which the Government have reviewed since 1990.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: All regulations affecting business, including licensing requirements are currently under review as part of the deregulation initiative. No information has been centrally collected on reviews of business licensing prior to the current exercise.

Statistical Forms

Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action has been taken to identify the potential for limiting the burden of statistical form filling on business.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Government Departments are reviewing the forms they issue to business as part of their overall review of regulations which affect industry. The deregulation task forces have also been looking at how the burden of form filling can be reduced and have made a number of proposals which we are considering.

THORP

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 3 December, Official Report, column 766, for what period of time the THORP receipt and storage pond at Sellafield has been designated for safeguards inspection by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Mr. Eggar: No time scale has been set.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the level 4 uranium commissioning at THORP has been completed; and what modifications have been demanded by the nuclear installations inspectorate before commissioning can proceed to level 5.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 9 December 1993]: Progress on level 4 commissioning of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant is a matter for British Nuclear Fuels plc. Level 5 commissioning can commence only if the new discharge authorisations for Sellafield are granted and the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate is satisfied as to its safety.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what economic costs expressed in net present value term were estimated by Touche Ross for a two-year delay in THORP to (i) the United Kingdom economy, (ii) BNFL and (iii) overseas customers.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 9 December 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) on 15 April 1993, Official Report, column 680.

Departmental Office, Teesside

Mr. Bates: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to establish a permanent office of the DTI on Teesside.

Mr. Eggar: The DTI already has an office in Billingham.

Tourism

Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how he intends to clarify the EC Package Travel Regulations for the United Kingdom tourist industry.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: All guidance issued by my Department is kept under review and we will be considering what revisions to make to the guidance notes on the Package Travel, Package Holidays and Package Tours Regulations 1992 in the light of recommendations from the retail, tourism and services deregulations task force.

Frogs' Legs

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state the quantities and country of origin of frogs' legs imported into the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Needham: The available information is given in the following table.

United Kingdom imports of frogs' legs

(metric tonnes)

Country of origin	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992
France	31·6	8·6	2·5	5·6	4·9
Belgium-Luxembourg	11·7	10·1	9·8	8·6	6·4

Total	60·2	36·4	28·7	29·1	22·8

Note: Frogs' legs are classified as heading 012.92 of the Standard International Trade Classification.

Accounts Services Agency

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much operating surplus has been surrendered by the Accounts Services Agency to the Exchequer each year since 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will retain in the public sector the Accounts Services Agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) on 29 October, Official Report, column 805. The review of the Accounts Services Agency has yet to be concluded. In due course a decision will be taken and an announcement made.

Sizewell B

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will ensure that the Sizewell B nuclear power station will be provided with containment which is demonstrated to be no less effective than the containment provided for test explosions of nuclear weapons; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what estimate he has made of the consequences of a disruptive explosion of the reactor pressure vessel of the Sizewell B nuclear power station in terms of (a) the total value today of expected losses and (b) the total numbers of injuries and premature deaths; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: All aspects of the Sizewell B pressurised water reactor (PWR) design including the operational safety of the reactor pressure vessel (RPV) and containment building, and the possibility of the catastrophic failure of the RPV were carefully scrutinised by eminent independent assessors during the extensive public inquiry into the Sizewell B proposal. These matters are further re-examined at the public inquiry for Hinkley Point C when a similar design of PWR to that for Sizewell B was proposed. The conclusion of both inquiries was that the possibility of RPV explosion was extremely remote. Moreover, Sizewell B has been built to a very high technical standard and the independent Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate will not consent to its operation if they are not completely satisfied that it is safe to do so.

Electricity

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the total (a) value and (b) number of kilowatt hours of electricity supplied to the United Kingdom by Electricité de France in each year since such supplies commenced.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 10 December 1993]: The net amount and value of electricity supplied to the United Kingdom from France has been as follows. Estimates of value since April 1990 are based on prevailing pool prices.

	Value £ million	Volume TWh
1986	80	4·3
1987	242	11·6
1988	268	12·8
1989	305	12·6

1991	343	16·4
1992	369	16·7

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what projections he has made of the (a) value and (b) volume of electricity which is expected to be imported from France in each of the next 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 10 December 1993]: A description of how trade across the interconnector with France was expected to develop in the foreseeable future was given in the Government's Coal Review White Paper (Cm. 2235), paragraphs 7.100 to 7.101.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will make it his policy to cease to import electricity from France; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will commission an independent report into the total employment effect, implications for the balance of payments, and impact upon Exchequer revenues and social security spending which have occurred or which will occur in the future as a result of the importation of electricity from France.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 10 December 1993]: The Government's policy towards trade in electricity across the interconnector was set out in chapter 7 of the Government's Coal Review White Paper (Cm. 2235).

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information he has concerning the percentage of electricity produced in each member country of the European Community from (a) nuclear, (b) coal, (c) gas, (d) orimulsion, (e) oil, (f) hydroelectric and (g) other powered generators.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 10 December 1993]: The information requested is shown in the following table. Separate figures for orimulsion are not available.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last met representatives of Electricité de France; and what was said at that meeting.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 10 December 1993]: I met the French Industry Minister, M. Longuet, in the summer. We discussed the liberalisation of the French energy market, opportunities for United Kingdom generators to export to and through France, and the levy-exempt status of Electricité de France's electricity exports to the United Kingdom.

WALES

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which of the woods owned by the Forestry Commission in Wales are now for sale; which have been sold; and what is the amount of sales receipts so far.

Lists giving details of the areas of forest land sold by the Forestry Commission from the start of the disposals programme in July 1981 to December 1992 are held in the Library of the House. A list of the forest land sold by the Commission in 1993 will be drawn up and placed in the Library of the House in the new year.

The receipts from the sales of forest land in Wales from July 1981 to 31 March 1993 were £18 million.

School Pupils

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will give a percentage breakdown of all subjects attempted at A-level during each of the last three years in English-medium schools in Wales, in Welsh-medium schools and in bilingual schools in Wales;

(2) what was the proportion of passes in each grade for each subject attempted at A-level during each of the last three years in English-medium schools in Wales, Welsh-medium schools and in bilingual schools in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Information is not collected in the form requested. Maintained secondary schools are designated as either Welsh speaking or not under the Education Reform Act 1988. Tables giving information on the proportion of passes at each grade for A level and a percentage breakdown for each subject for Welsh speaking and non Welsh speaking schools for available years has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of children from (a) Welsh-medium schools, (b) English-medium schools and (c) bilingual schools went on to university; what proportion of those undertook to read mathematics or science; and if he will give comparable data for English-medium schools in Wales and bilingual schools.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information is not available in the form requested. Maintained secondary schools are classified as either Welsh speaking or not Welsh speaking under the Education Reform Act 1988. In 1991-92, 25 per cent. of all pupils leaving Welsh speaking schools and 18 per cent. of those leaving schools not designated as Welsh speaking entered higher education institutions. Information is not collected on the subjects which pupils intend to study.

Cormorants

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications his Department has received in the last 12 months for licences to control the number of cormorant on Welsh fisheries; and how many of these have been approved.

Mr. Redwood: Four applications have been received in the last 12 months; three have been rejected and one is under consideration.

Crickhowell Bypass

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current level of financial commitment for the employment of consultants for the investigation into the Crickhowell bypass scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Some £593,000 has been expended since mid-1989 on fees and expenses to consultants employed for the two public consultations and the preparation of the necessary engineering, environmental, archaeological and town planning studies in connection with this scheme.

All views expressed following the recent public consultation are being carefully considered before a decision is taken on whether or not to proceed with any of the published routes.

Trawsfynydd

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will reverse the decision to allow Nuclear Electric plc to burn radioactive waste oil and other contaminated materials at Trawsfynydd; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: No, my right hon. Friend sees no grounds for doing so, especially as high temperature incineration is widely accepted to be the most suitable environmental option for this type of waste.

Opencast Coal Mines

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy in respect of the construction of opencast coal mines in sites of special scientific interest, with particular reference to the proximity of national parks; what such proposals he has recently received; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Minerals Planning Guidance Note 3, "Opencast Coal Mining", advises that opencast coal proposals in sites of special scientific interest or affecting national parks should be subject to a most rigorous examination. Currently there are no proposals before me for determination.

Forestry Commission Land

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, for each separate piece of land currently owned or leased by the Forestry Commission in Mid Glamorgan, South Glamorgan and West Glamorgan (a) its land and (b) its area in hectares; and whether he will place a map in the Library which names and identifies each of these pieces of land.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 8 December 1993 at columns 237-238.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to place on the agenda of the European Union Heads of Government summit meeting in Brussels on 10 to 11 December the matter of nuclear reprocessing and plutonium stockpiles in the European Community.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the policy of the Child Support Agency in respect of payments to children whose fathers are dead.

Mr. Burt: Child support legislation is applicable only where there is an absent parent. Where a child's natural or adoptive father is dead, no application for child support maintenance can be made.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91; and how many vehicles were involved.

Mr. Hague: Five vehicles were provided and the net cost, exclusive of VAT, was £209,989.

Child Benefit

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much money families will receive in total in child benefit this year; and how much more would have been received if the number of children were the same as in 1979.

Mr. Burt: It is estimated that families will receive about £6 billion in total in child benefit in 1993-94 and that a further £500 million would have been received if the number of children were the same as in 1978-79.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what dates since 1978 there has been an announcement of change in the level of child benefit; when each change came into effect; and by which Minister each change was announced.

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table.

[1] Labour administration.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cases to date have been considered by the Child Support Agency; how many and what percentage of those cases have resulted in the establishment of new financial support arrangements; and in how many and what percentage of those cases a court maintenance order was already in operation.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mrs. Ann Winterton, dated 10 December 1993:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking questions about the operations of the Child Support Agency.

To 31 October 1993, the Agency has processed over 107,000 cases. Of these, 47,000 (44% of the total) have resulted in the arrangement of maintenance. Figures are not not kept on the proportion of these cases in which a court order for maintenance was already in operation. We estimate, however, that about 50% of cases taken on by 31 October were already receiving maintenance.

I hope you will find this reply helpful.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how the planned changes to incapacity benefit will affect the entitlements of patients who suffer from severe heart conditions and strokes.

Mr. Scott: A new, more objective, medical test of incapacity for work will apply to claims for incapacity benefit. The new test will assess, on a case-by-case basis, the incapacitating nature of a condition or combinations of conditions on the ability to work. Specific medical conditions such as strokes can have a wide range of effects from severe to very mild. We expect that those with more severe conditions would satisfy the test.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will consider reintroducing earnings-related unemployment benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: The Government have no plans to reintroduce earnings-related unemployment benefit.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 23 November, Official Report, column 35, which company arranges travel for his officials; and what form bills take if records are kept by mode of travel only.

Mr. Hague: Wagon-Lits Travel Ltd. is the approved contractor for business travel by officials of the Department. The company presents its bills in two forms. Each month, a list of all travel transactions is provided in invoice date order together with cost centre analyses of individual expenditure for internal accounting purposes.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on how many occasions and at what cost to public funds officials have visited his private residence in France.

Mr. Hague: Department of Social Security officials have visited the house of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in France on one occasion. The cost of the visit was £449·24.

Family Credit

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide a table showing the number of families receiving family credit per week of (a) less than £100, (b) between £100 and £120, (c) between £120 and £140, (d) between £140 and £150, (e) between £150 and £160, (f) between £160 and £180, (g) between £180 and £200, (h) between £200 and £250 and (i) over £300; and in each category how many he expects will gain (i) nothing, (ii) between £0 and £10, (iii) between £10 and £20 and (iv) between £20 and £28 as a result of the proposed changes announced in the Budget statement relating to family credit.

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is in the table:

Family credit recipients

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will estimate the number of families receiving family credit which he expects will gain (a) nothing, (b) between £0 and £10, (c) between £10 and £20 and (d) between £20 and £28 as a result of the proposed changes announced in the Budget statement relating to family credit;

Mr. Burt: We estimate that the assistance with child care costs will give substantial help to 150,000 families. A total of 80,000 families already on family credit will benefit and 20,000 at present just outside the family credit scheme will become entitled. We estimate that 50,000 families presently on income support will be enabled to take up work as a result of the change.

The amount of increase in the family credit award for those already receiving the benefit will be related to the actual child care costs up to a maximum of £40 which they incur.

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families receiving family credit have (a) two parents with (i) one child, (ii) two children, (iii) three children and (iv) four children or more and (b) one parent with (i) one child, (ii) two children, (iii) three children and (iv) four children or more; and if he will estimate how many in each category will gain (1) nothing, (2) between £0 to £10, (3) between £10 to £20 and (4) between £20 to £28 as a result of the proposed changes to family credit announced in the Budget.

Agriculture Tenancies

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps she has to retain the 15-year minimum fixed term for agriculture tenancy; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: A statutory minimum term has never featured in our proposals for tenancy reform; nor is it included in the common position agreed by industry organisations last week.

In the light of that agreement, we shall be going ahead with all the necessary steps so that we shall be ready to introduce legislation as soon as parliamentary time becomes available.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what spending she plans following the allocation made to her Department in the Budget directly in 1994-95 on (a) sea defence and coast protection, (b) inland drainage and flood protection and (c) supporting the common fisheries policy.

Mr. Jack: The information requested on 1994-95 spending plans is as follows:

	£ million
Grants to the National Rivers Authority

Grants to local authorities
coast protection	26·6
sea defence, inland drainage and flood protection	2·1
Grants to Internal Drainage Boards
inland drainage and flood protection	1·0
Supporting the Common Fisheries Policy (including market support, degressive withdrawal scheme and flat rate aid scheme)	2·0

Forestry Commission Land

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if she will include Forestry Commission woods in Nottinghamshire in her list of commission land in England for which there is no question of privatisation;

(2) if she will list all those Forestry Commission landholdings in England for which there will be no question of privatisation.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Forestry Ministers have asked the forestry review group to review options for the ownership and management of Forestry Commission woodlands, and to make proposals for changes which would improve the effectiveness of the delivery of the Government's forestry policy objectives, having regard to the Government's other economic and envrionmental policies.

We will await the advice of the review group before considering what further action, if any, should be taken in respect of the ownership and management of Forestry Commission woodlands.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what plans she has to take into account the views of local people, organisations and local authorities in England when deciding which areas of Forestry Commission land will not be privatised;

(2) what account she takes of the views of local people when confirming that there is no question of privatising particular areas of Forestry Commission land in England.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 25 November 1993]: About 3,000 individuals and 300 organisations have already written to Ministers and the forestry review group, setting out their views. The group is taking full account of these as it prepares its report.

There will be full consultation of the general public and interested bodies on the options preferred by Ministers before matters are taken forward. The form and timing of consultation will depend on the advice which the review group offers Ministers and what conclusions Ministers draw from that advice.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list, for each separate piece of land currently owned or leased by the Forestry Commission in Hereford and Worcester, Oxfordshire, Shropshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire (a) its name and (b) its area in hectares; and if she will place a map in the Library which names and identifies each of these pieces of land.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 6 December 1993]: The Forestry Commission manages the following areas of land in Cheshire, Cumbria and Lancashire:

County	Area (hectares)
Cheshire	948
Cumbria	26,508
Lancashire	1,816

I have made arrangements for a map showing the location of the individual areas to be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

The more detailed information requested on the individual areas is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

EMPLOYMENT

Enterprise Allowances

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many enterprise allowances were granted in each training and enterprise council area and in each standard region in the 1992-93 financial year; in how many such cases the term of the allowance was completed; and in how many cases the enterprise allowance resulted in the continuation of a business after completion.

Miss Widdecombe: The business start-up scheme replaced the enterprise allowance scheme in April 1991. Table 1 gives the number of business start-up scheme starts in 1992-93 for each training and enterprise council—TEC —and region in England and Wales.

Information about whether the period of allowances was completed is not held centrally.

Information on the continuation of business is not available for individual TECs, but is available regionally from special surveys. The latest figures cover starts in April and May 1991 which were still in business 18 months later in November 1992. These are shown in table 2.

Unemployed People (Training)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of people unemployed for over six months each Employment Service regional office has referred to providers of training each month since January.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Andrew Hunter, dated 13 December 1993.

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about referrals to providers of training.

The information you requested is set out in the attached table.

I should explain that people who are unemployed for six months are interviewed by a Client Adviser (and at six month intervals thereafter should they remain unemployed). At this interview their employment needs are discussed with a view to helping them back to work by agreeing a referral to a job, training or other suitable opportunity, e.g. a Jobclub.

I hope this is helpful.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his policy in respect of the surplus revenue over expenditure which is being held by training and enterprise councils.

Miss Widdecombe: Training and enterprise councils —TECs—need reserves to protect the viability of their businesses. Beyond that, TECs are required to use their efficiency savings to further the objectives of their corporate plans and business plans. I know that many TECs have plans for spending their reserves effectively.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much funding has been made available to each training and enterprise council each year, expressed in cash and real terms using prices from the first year's funding and as a real terms percentage increase or decrease on the previous year.

Miss Widdecombe: Funding made available to each training and enterprise council by the Department for the last three years, expressed in cash terms and real terms using prices from the first year's funding and as a real term percentage increase or decrease on the previous year, is shown in the following table:

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what criteria determine the amount of funding for individual training and enterprise councils.

Miss Widdecombe: A training and enterprise council —TEC—negotiates with the Employment Department for the allocation of funds for training programmes based on its business plans for the year. When allocating funds, the Department takes account of a range of factors, including the quality of training to be provided, the balance of training between occupations, the expected demand for places by unemployed people, and contributions from employers towards the cost of training. The Department will also take efficiency savings made by a TEC into account when negotiating prices for training.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place in the Library a list of the directors of each training and enterprise council and the companies or organisations they represent.

Miss Widdecombe: Yes. I am doing so for all training and enterprise councils—TECs—in England. Information for the TECs in Wales is for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to supply.

Directors of TECs are chosen to represent the range and diversity of the local labour market and not a particular company or organisation.

I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as this has been done.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total budget for training and enterprise councils in England and Wales for (a) 1992-93 and (b) 1993-94; and what is the planned budget for 1994-95.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The budget for training and enterprise councils—TECs—in England for 1992-93 was £1·536 million. The total budget for 1993-94 is £1·738 million, including allowance payments for training and work participants, excluded from the 1992-93 budget.

Details of TEC budgets in 1994-95 will not be known until contract negotiations with councils are finalised in the spring of 1994.

Budget information relating to Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Training Allowances

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) 16-year-olds and (b) 17-year-olds in (i) Dundee and (ii) Scotland were in receipt of a bridging allowance at the latest available date and on that corresponding date in each of the previous five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. John McAllion, dated 13 December 1993.

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about bridging allowance.

The information you have requested, taking 16 year olds and 17 year olds together, is provided in the attached table. Unfortunately, a breakdown by age is not available, nor is the November 1988 figure for Dundee.

Bridging Allowance can be paid to young people as long as they are registered at a Careers Office for Youth Training (YT) and have left or lost a job or YT place.

It is a short-term allowance paid for up to 40 days in any 52 week period while a young person finds another job or YT place.

I hope this is helpful.

Numbers in receipt of Bridging Allowance in Dundee and Scotland November 1988—November 1993

November	Dundee	Scotland
1988	—	2,102
1989	37	1,157
1990	54	1,349
1991	34	1,099
1992	34	957
1993	17	553

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the training allowance paid to (a) 16-year-olds and (b) 17-year-olds on YTS and YT schemes in each of the past five years; and what the current allowance would be if it had been uprated in line with inflation over those five years.

Miss Widdecombe: The training allowances over each of the last five years have been £29·50 per week for 16-year-olds and £35 per week for 17-year-olds. The value of these allowance if they had been uprated in line with inflation is shown in the table:

	Allowance levels
Year	16-year-old £	17-year-old £
1989-90	29·50	35·00
1990-91	31·88	37·82
1991-92	33·90	40·22
1992-93	35·20	41·76
1993-94	36·34	43·12

Transexuals

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to amend the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 explicitly to include discrimination against transexuals; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The Government deplore all forms of discrimination. It is not persuaded, however, that the Sex Discrimination Act should be extended to cover discrimination against transexuals and has no plans to legislate in this area.

Education Allowance

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are presently on full-time vocational courses as a result of the education allowance introduced in the Budget statement of 16 March 1993, Official Report, column 193.

Miss Widdecombe: As at 11 November, the last date for which figures are available, approximately 6,200 people were participating in learning for work.

Community Action Programme

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are engaged in part-time work under the community action programme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Stephen Byers, dated 13 December 1993:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about the number of people engaged in part-time work under the Community Action programme.

It may help if I explain the background to Community Action and our plans for the provision of the announced places.

Community Action is a programme to help long-term unemployed people back into work, by providing work experience on projects of benefit to local communities. Following the Budget, a further 35,000 opportunities will be made available between now and 1995/6 in addition to the 60,000 announced last Spring.

Community Action opportunities are being delivered, in the main, by voluntary/charitable organisations and my people in the Employment Service Regional Offices are responsible for contracting with them. At 26 November, the latest date for which figures are available, 2,876 places had been taken up by long term unemployed people and numbers are increasing steadily. The programme is planned to build to 20,000 filled places by the end of 1994.

I hope this is helpful.

SCOTLAND

Young People

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many 16 and 17-year-olds there were in (a) Dundee and (b) Scotland in each of the past five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Stewart: The information requested is given in the table.

Estimated population aged 16 and 17

Hospital Closures

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about Ayrshire and Arran health board's plans for the closure of Ravenspark hospital in the longer term; and what actions the health board has been undertaking to safeguard the interests of hospital patients.

Mr. Stewart: For some time it has been the publicly declared intention of Ayrshire and Arran health board to replace facilities at Ravenspark in early 1995.

The contract for the care of the present residents at Ravenspark hospital has been awarded to the Ayrshire and Arran community health care NHS trust and this contract is monitored by the health board.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment has been made by the Scottish Office of the costs involved in establishing the NHS trusts in Scotland; and if he will make a statement on the costs involved in setting up the south Ayrshire NHS Trust, the Community Health Care NHS Trust and the north Ayrshire and Arran NHS Trust.

Mr. Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) on 6 December 1993, Official Report column 77. Already the evidence emerging from NHS trusts in Scotland is of more patients being treated, improved facilities and services better adapted to patient needs. This is very promising and I am sure that the general public in Ayrshire, as elsewhere, will want to encourage trusts in their endeavours to further improve patient care.

Scottish Homes

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will make a statement about the guidelines which he has drawn up for Scottish Homes in carrying out the transfer of its housing stock, with particular reference to transfer of Scottish Homes properties to local authority control;

(2) if he will make a statement about the transfer of Scottish Homes properties in Ayrshire; what point the transfer process has reached in Ayrshire; and what is the time scale within which the disposal process will be completed.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has issued guidance to Scottish Homes on the voluntary disposal of its housing stock. This has been taken into account by Scottish Homes in its published procedures which promote substantial safeguards for tenants. All transfer proposals must have the agreement of tenants and are subject to the approval of my right hon. Friend who will be willing to consider a recommendation for a disposal to a local authority where Scottish Homes takes the view that there will be special circumstances such that the disposal would not compromise Ministers' and Scottish Homes' objective of promoting diversity of choice in rented housing. It is expected that such circumstances will rarely arise.

Scottish Homes is currently preparing a local stock strategy which will address the transfer of its stock in Ayrshire. Tenants will be fully consulted on specific proposals and transfers will take place at a pace consistent with tenants wishes.

Forestry

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he now expects the work of the interdepartmental review group on the Forestry Commission will be completed and a report made to Ministers.

Sir Hector Monro: Ministers expect the Forestry review group to present its advice to them early next year.

Homelessness

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the initiatives the Scottish Office is pursuing to tackle the problem of homelessness amongst young people in Scotland, with particular reference to Ayrshire.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Housing authorities have the statutory responsibility for dealing with homelessness. On 1 December I announced £4·35 million extra resources for expenditure on 36 homelessness projects by housing authorities in 1993-94, including £0·456 million for authorities in Ayrshire. Nearly £23 million had already been made available in financial years 1991-92 and 1992-93, including almost £1·83 million for Ayrshire authorities. Many projects supported by those extra resources are for young single homeless.

These extra allocations are in addition to the substantial resources already allocated to housing authorities for investment in public and private housing—£513 million in 1993-94. All local housing authorities have been asked in their housing plans and housing capital programmes to set out strategies and targets for tackling homelessness in their areas.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91; and how many vehicles were involved.

Mr. Lang: The cost to the Scottish Office of the car service for Ministers in 1990-91 was £212,286. The number of vehicles involved was three in London and four —part-time—in Scotland.

New Towns

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the representations he has received from Scottish and Ayrshire Enterprise as regards his decision to consult on the early wind-up of Irvine new town; and if he will indicate which bodies supported amending the wind-up proposals.

Mr. Stewart: Scottish Enterprise and Enterprise Ayrshire welcomed the proposals for early transfer of responsibility for economic development within Irvine. Both organisations recognise that a smooth transition is desirable and discussions to achieve this are underway.

Of the other bodies consulted, Strathclyde regional council expressed opposition to the proposals and Scottish Homes offered no comment. Cunninghame district council, COSLA and SLANT expressed concern that the wind-up would be at the same time as local government re-structuring and outlined the approach which, in their view, would need to be adopted in order to achieve a smooth and orderly transfer of responsibilities.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has given to new town development corporations on the disposal of multi-storey flats in shared ownership between corporations and owner occupiers as part of their winding up; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 9 December 1993]: The Scottish Office Industry Department has provided the new town development corporations with comprehensive guidance on the disposal of their housing stocks on wind-up. A copy of the guidance was sent to the hon. Member on 31 August 1992.

The guidance requires the corporations to have regard to their existing responsibilities in respect of owner-occupiers, whether in multi-storey flats or any other types of accommodation, and to ensure that owner-occupiers are kept fully informed about any changes which may affect their interests.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in respect of each of the Scottish new towns, what were (a) the financial targets set for the sales of assets in each of the last five years, (b) the receipts from sales for the separate categories of housing, industrial, commercial and land assets for each of the last five years and (c) the receipts from sales in the current financial year for the separate categories of housing, industrial, commercial and land assets.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 9 December 1993]: The information is shown in the table. A breakdown of non-housing receipts between those derived from the sale of industrial assets, commercial assets and land is not available centrally.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the total cost of press liaison and publicity carried out by his Department in each year since 1979; how many press and publicity officers were employed in each such year; and what has been the total cost of their remuneration.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 10 December 1993]: The following table shows (a) the running costs of The Scottish Office information directorate for each year from 1985-86 and (b) the number of information officer grades employed in each year since 1979:

[1] The figures for running costs exclude expenditure on information campaigns. Directly comparable figures for years prior to the introduction of new Scottish Office budgetary arrangements in 1985-86 are not available. Nor is it possible to break down the running costs figures to differentiate between the remuneration of information officer grades and administrative staff within the Directorate.

Advertising

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the tendering arrangements and controls employed by his Department for advertising campaigns; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 10 December 1993]: A review of the Scottish Office advertising contract is held every three years. The last review was held in Febuary this year. Advertisements inviting agencies to tender for the work were placed in Scottish national daily newspapers and in the trade journal Campaign.

Appointment was made following a three-stage selection appraisal of creativity, strategy planning and value for money. The judging panel comprised representatives from the Scottish Office information directorate, The Scottish Office purchase and supply unit, and the director of advertising, Central Office of Information.

Assessment of the performance of the agencies through campaign evaluation is undertaken throughout the year. An audit of television airtime buying is currently being carried out by an independent consultant. Agencies are appointed on a renewable annual contract.
